mesoxalic (mes-ok-sal'ik), a. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + E. oxalic.] Of, pertaining to, or derived from oxalic acid: as, mesoxalic acid, $C(OH)_2(CO_2H)_2$, a crystalline solid which readily breaks up into carbonic oxid and oxalic acid.

Mesozoa (mes-ō-zō'ä), n. pl. [NL., pl. of mesozoön.] A provisional primary division of animals, considered intermediate between the Protozoa and the Metazoa, and based upon the characters of the Dicyemida alone. These animals have no mesoderm, yet develop metazoic embryos by epiboly. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 578.

Mesozoic (mes-ō-zō'ik), a. and n. [< Gr. μέσος, middle, + ζωή, life.] In geol., noting the part of the geological series, or of geological time, between the Paleozoic and the Tertiary rocks.

It is a synonym of Secondary as that term is employed by geologists. The whole series of fossiliferous rocks is divided into Paleozoic, Mesozoic or Secondary, and Cenozoic or Tertiary. The principal subdivisions of the Mesozoic are the Trias or Triassic, the Jura or Jurassic, and the Cretaceous. (See these terms.) The Mesozoic is distinguished for the great development of the Reptilia, and its era has hence been called the "Age of Reptiles." In the Mesozoic occur the first traces of mammals, of birds, and of fishes with bony skeletons.

mesozoön (mes-ō-zō'on), n. [NL., < Gr. μέσος, middle, + ζῷον, animal.] One of the Mesozoa.

Mespilus (mes'pi-lus), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < L. mespilus, also mespila, mespilum, < Gr. μέσπιλον, medlar-tree, a medlar, μεσπίλη, medlar-tree: see medlar.] A genus of plants belonging to the family Malaceæ, characterized by the bony endocarp of the fruit and the expanded mouth of the leafy calyx.

They are shrubs or small trees, more or less thorny when wild, and have undivided, nearly sessile leaves, and large white or pinkish flowers, solitary and sessile on short leafy branches. The fruit is nearly globular or pear-shaped, and is crowned by a broad, hairy disk, from which the five bony cells slightly protrude. The genus includes one (or perhaps two) species, found in various parts of Europe and western Asia. M. Germanica is the common medlar, cultivated in many varieties for its fruit. See medlar.

mespriset†, n. See misprize.

mesquit[1]†, n. [Also mesquite, meskit, meskite, meschit, meskeito; < Sp. mesquita, mezquita, < Ar. masjid, a mosque: see mosque and masjid.] A mosque.

The Mesquit (for many of them are Mahumetanes) is of bricke. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 461.

This foresayd late prince Ismael lieth buried in a faire Meşkit, with a sumptuous sepulchre in the same. Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 347.

The very Mahometans . . . have their sepulchres near the Meskeito; never in it. Bp. Hall, Works, V. 414. (Davies.)

mesquit[2], n. Same as mesquite.

mesquite (mes-kē'tā, Anglicized mes'kēt or ★mes-kēt'), n. [Also mesquit, mezquit, mezkeet, etc.: < Mex. Sp. mezquite, mesquite, < Nahuatl mizquitl.] 1. An important leguminous tree, or often shrub, Prosopis juliflora, growing from Texas to southern California, and thence southward to Chile.

Under the action of prairie fires it is reduced to a low shrub, developing then an enormous mass of roots, locally known as underground forest, of great value as fuel. The wood is heavy and very hard, almost indestructible in contact with the ground; it is used for the beams and underpinnings of adobe houses, for posts and fencing, for fuel, and for furniture. It is of a brown or red color, handsome when polished, but difficult to work. The bean-like pods, before maturity, become pulpy and exceedingly rich in grape-sugar. They are eaten by the Indians as well as by whites, and furnish a valuable fodder for horses. The shrub also exudes a gum resembling gum arabic, which in Texas and Mexico is collected in considerable quantities for export. Also called honey-mesquit, honey-locust, honey-pod, and July-flower. The Spanish name is algarroba.

Here and there are trees of acacia and mezquite, the denizens of the desert land. Mayne Reid, Scalp Hunt., i. 14.

2. Same as mesquite-grass.—Screw-pod mesquite, a tree, Prosopis odorata, similar to P. juliflora, found from New Mexico to southern California, and in Mexico. Its pods are twisted into spiral cylinders, whence the above name, and that of screw-bean. They are ground into meal and used as food by the Indians, also serving as fodder. The Mexican name is tornillo.

mesquite-bean (mes-kē'tā-bēn), n. The fruit of the mesquite-tree.

mesquite-grass (mes-kē'tā-gras), n. A grass, properly of the genus Bouteloua, growing on the plains east of the Rocky Mountains, and forming a rich wild pasturage. B. oligostachya is the most useful species. Bulbilis dactyloides, included under the name, is sometimes distinguished as false mesquite. Also called buffalo-grass and grama-grass.

mesquite-gum, n. See mesquite.

mesquite-tree, n. Same as mesquite.

Mesropian (mes-rō'pi-an), a. [< Mesrob (see def.) + -ian.] Of or pertaining to Mesrob or Miesrob (fifth century A. D.), patriarch of Armenia, a reputed founder of Armenian literature, who devised the Armenian alphabet of thirty-six letters, to which after his time two more were added, and the Georgian alphabet of thirty-nine or forty letters, still in use.

In 406 A. D. the Mesropian alphabet was adopted by an edict of the Armenian king. Isaac Taylor, The Alphabet, II. 271.

★mess[1] (mes), n. [< ME. mes, mess, messe, < OF. mes (F. mets—a bad spelling), a portion of food, a dish, a course at table, = It. messo, m., also messa, f., a course at table, < ML. missum* (found only as messum, after OF., a portion of land), prop. neut. of L. missus, sent, pp. of mittere, send: see mission. Cf. AS. sand, sond, early ME. sond, a mess, dish, lit. a sending: see send. The word mess (ME. mēs) may have been partly confused in ME. with mēs, mese, a dinner: see mese[1].] 1. A supply or provision of anything to be eaten at one meal; a quantity of food sufficient for one or more persons for a single occasion: as, a mess of peas for dinner; a mess of oats for a horse.

And he took and sent messes unto them from before him: but Benjamin's mess was five times so much as any of theirs. Gen. xliii. 34.

Of herbs, and other country messes,
Which the neat-handed Phillis dresses.
Milton, L'Allegro, l. 85.

'Tis only a page that carols unseen,
Crumbling your hounds their messes.
Browning, Pippa Passes, ii.

Μεσσίας, < Heb. Māshīach, anointed, < māshach, anoint.] A designation of Jesus as the Saviour of the world; the Hebrew equivalent of Christ, the Anointed, but used more frequently as a descriptive title (the Messiah) than as a name: from prophetic passages in the Hebrew Scriptures (where, except in two instances in Daniel, it is translated Anointed, often as a noun) interpreted by Jesus and by Christians as referring to him and universal in scope, but regarded by the Jews as promising a divinely sent deliverer for their own race. This belief in a coming Messiah is still held as a doctrine by many Jews; and at various periods of the Christian era impostors have assumed the name and character, and have had many adherents. The title is also applied figuratively to historical characters who have been great deliverers. Sometimes written, after the Greek of the New Testament, Messias.

We have found Messias, which is, being interpreted, the Christ. John i. 41.

In the High Church of Jerusalem, the Christians were but another Sect of Jews, that did believe the Messias was come. Selden, Table-Talk, p. 33.

mestful†, a. [Var. of mestive, with substituted suffix -ful.] Sad; gloomy. [Rare.]

Emong all other birds
Most mestfull birde am I:
Emong all fethered foules
I first complain and crie.
Kendall, Flowers of Epigrammes (1577). (Nares.)

mestif†, n. An obsolete variant of mastiff.

mestive† (mes′tiv), a. [< L. mæstus, mœstus, sad, mournful (< mærere, mœrere, be sad, mourn), + E. -ive. Cf. mestful.] Sad; sorrowful; gloomy; dismal.

The Melancholy 's mestiue, and too full
Of fearfull thoughts, and cares vnrequisit.
Davies, Microcosmos, p. 31. (Davies.)

mestizo (mes-tē′zō), n. [= G. mestize, < Sp. mestizo = OF. mestis, F. métis, mixed, mongrel: see mastiff.] The offspring of a person of mixed blood; especially, a person of mixed Spanish and American Indian parentage.

To Mexico there is such a great resort, that all the towns thereabout which were formerly of Indians are now inhabited by Spaniards and Mestizoes.
S. Clarke, Geographical Description, etc. (1671), p. 261.

He [Mr. Werner] also saw something of Tippoo Tip during the expeditions between the Falls and Barttelot's camp on the Aruwimi; but was not very favourably impressed by that wily mestizo. The Academy, June 29, 1889, p. 441.

mestling[1]†, n. See maslin[1].

mestling[2]†, n. See maslin[2].

mestlion†, mestlyon†, n. See maslin[2].

mestome (mes′tōm), n. [NL. (Schwendener), appar. < Gr. μέστωμα, fullness, < μεστός, full.] In bot., that part of a fibrovascular bundle whose function is mainly conduction.

To the elements which impart strength to a bundle Schwendener has given the name stereome; to the other parts of the bundle, mestome.
Goodale, Physiological Botany, p. 191.

Mesua (mes′ū-ą), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), named after Musuah, an Arabian physician of the 8th and 9th centuries.] A genus of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants of the family Clusiaceæ and the tribe Calophylleæ, characterized by an ovary which is two-celled and contains four ovules, and by a shield-shaped stigma. They are shrubs or trees with very narrow leaves and large axillary solitary flowers. Three species, natives of eastern India and Java, are recognized by modern authors. M. ferrea, one of the ironwoods, is common in the East Indies, wild and cultivated. It is a straight, erect tree with elegant foliage and large four-petaled flowers, pure white and fragrant. They afford a native dye and perfume, and are exported, mostly for the latter purpose, under the name nagkassar. The seeds yield a dark thick oil (nagkassar- or nahor-oil), used in lamps and medicinally. The hard reddish-brown wood is suitable for machinery, railroad-ties, etc.; it is also used for tool-handles and the like.

mesuage†, n. An obsolete form of messuage.

mesurable†, a. A Middle English form of measurable.

mesure†, n. and v. A Middle English form of measure.

mesymnion (me-sim′ni-on), n.; pl. mesymnia (-ä). [NL., < Gr. μεσύμνιον (see def.), < μέσος, middle, + ὕμνος, hymn: see hymn.] In anc. pros., a short colon introduced between lines in the midst of a system or stanza, especially in a hymn. See ephymnium, methymnion, proömnion.

met[1] (met). Preterit and past participle of meet[1].

met[2]†. An obsolete preterit of mete[1].

met[3] (met), n. [See mete[1].] A measure of any kind; a bushel; a barrel. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.]

meta (mē′tä), n.; pl. metæ (-tē). [L.] In Rom. antiq., a conical column or post, or, usually, a group of three such posts, at each end of the spina of a circus, serving to mark the place of turning; a turning-post.

On the other side of the figure of the queen-goddess is a tall hippodrome meta, enriched with garlands of flowers — probably having reference to the sacred contests at the founding of a new city.
The Academy, June 15, 1889, p. 417.

★meta- (met′ä). [L., etc., meta-, < Gr. μετα-, prefix, μετά, poet. μεταί, Doric πέδα or πεδά, prep., with gen., in the midst of, among, between, along with; with dat. (poetical), among, with, in, besides; with acc., into the midst of, coming among, after, beyond, according to, etc.; in comp., between, after, over (denoting change, like L. trans-); = Goth. mith = AS. mid, ME. mid, with: see mid[2].] A prefix in words of Greek origin or formation, meaning 'among, between, with, after, beyond, over,' etc., often denoting change or transformation (like L. trans-), in which denotation it is much used in the formation of new terms in science. In zoöl. it generally denotes 'after' or 'beyond,' in place or time; 'hind' or 'hinder,' of place; 'later,' in time, as if implying changes or transformation which required time to accomplish: generally correlated with pro- or proto- and meso-: as, Protozoa, Mesozoa, Metazoa; prothorax, mesothorax, metathorax; Prototheria and Metatheria; metacarpus and metatarsus (coming next after the carpus and tarsus), etc. In chem.: (a) It is used to form the names of aromatic compounds in which two radicals which replace hydrogen in the benzene ring are conceived of as attached to alternate carbon atoms: distinguished from ortho-, in which the attachment is to adjacent carbon atoms, and from para-, in which the attachment is to opposite carbon atoms. (b) It indicates that an oxygen acid has been formed from the corresponding ortho-acid by the withdrawal of one, two, or three molecules of water, forming mono-meta-, di-meta-, or tri-meta-acids. (c) It is somewhat loosely applied to indicate derivation or close chemical relation, as metachloral, metacetone.

metabasis (me-tab′ą-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μετάβασις, a passing over, shifting, change, < μεταβαίνειν, pass over, < μετά, beyond, + βαίνειν, go, pass: see basis.] 1. In rhet., a passing from one thing to another; transition.—2. In med., a change, as in treatment or remedies, or of air, tissue, disease, etc. Also called metabola.

metabatic (met-ą-bat′ik), a. [< Gr. μεταβατικός, able to pass from one place to another, exchanging, < μετάβασις, a passing over: see metabasis.] Pertaining to the transfer of energy, especially to the passage of heat from one body to another.—Metabatic function, a function whose identity for two substances expresses the equilibrium of actual energy between them.

metabola[1] (me-tab′ō-lä), n. [NL., < Gr. μεταβολή, change, exchange, < μεταβάλλειν, throw round, turn about, change, < μετά, beyond, + βάλλειν, throw.] Same as metabasis, 2.

Metabola[2] (me-tab′ō-lä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl., < Gr. μεταβόλος, changeable.] Insects which undergo complete or entire metamorphosis or transformation, as the Diptera, Lepidoptera, Coleoptera, and Hymenoptera: in contradistinction to the Heterometabola. In some systems the Metabola are regarded as a subclass of Insecta, correlated with Hemimetabola and Ametabola. They are also called Heteromorpha and Holometabola. The three stages of such insects are those of the larva, pupa, and imago. The Metabola are divided by some into the Mandibulata and Haustellata.

metabolian (met-ą-bō′li-ąn), n. [< Metabola[2] + -ian.] A metabolic insect; one of the Metabola.

metabolic (met-ą-bol′ik), a. [< Gr. μεταβολικός, changeable, < μεταβόλος, changeable, μεταβολή, change: see metabola[1].] 1. In zoöl.: (a) Undergoing complete metamorphosis, as an insect; of or pertaining to the Metabola. Also metabolous. (b) Changeable in form; assuming different characters; polymorphic: applied by Cohn to the Infusoria.—2. In biol., exhibiting or affected by metabolism: as, metabolic processes; metabolic changes.

metabolism (me-tab′ō-lizm), n. [As metabol-y + -ism.] 1. In theol., the consensus of views of some of the early fathers in regard to the eucharist, favoring an objective union of the sensible with the supersensible, or the real with the symbolical presence.—2. In poetry, a change from one meter into another.—3. In entom., metamorphosis; transformation; metaboly; transition from larva to pupa, or from pupa to imago.—4. In biol.: (a) The sum of the chemical changes within the body, or within any single cell of the body, by which the protoplasm is either renewed or changed to perform special functions, or else disorganized and prepared for excretion. Thus, the formation of the colorless blood-corpuscles, the elaboration of the digestive ferments, and the breaking up of proteids into urea and other products are examples of metabolism. Compare anabolism, catabolism.

To the assemblage of chemical processes, or rather to the assemblage of transformations which a constituent of the organism such as a proteid undergoes in its passage through the body, the term metabolism has been applied.
Gamgee, Physiol. Chem., I. 5.

(b) Especially, retrograde metamorphosis; catabolism.

metabolite (me-tab′ō-līt), n. [As metabol-y + -ite[2].] A product of or substance resulting from metabolism, especially from retrograde metabolism, or catabolism.

If by disease or by artificial removal this metabolism is prevented, the incompletely metabolized pigments circulate in the blood, and staining of skin and mucous membrane, as in Addison's disease, may take place. In the urine of Addison's disease such an imperfect metabolite occurs.
Dr. C. A. MacMunn, Proc. Roy. Soc., XXXIX. 251.

metabolize (me-tab′ō-līz), v. t.; pret. and pp. metabolized, ppr. metabolizing. [As metabol-y + -ize.] In biol., to subject to metabolism; transform by either assimilation or decomposition.

Occasionally an omnivore can take in everything, and digest and so metabolize it as to organise it into healthy mental tissue. They are, however, the few.
Science, IX. 264.

metabolous (me-tab′ō-lus), a. [< Gr. μεταβόλος, changeable: see Metabola[2].] In entom., same as metabolic. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 366.

metaboly (me-tab′ō-li), n. [< Gr. μεταβολή, later also μεταβολία, change, exchange: see metabola[1].] Same as metabolism.

metabranchial (met-ą-brang′ki-ąl), a. [< Gr. μετά, behind, + βράγχια, gills: see branchial.] Situated behind the gills: specifically applied to a posterolateral subdivision of the branchial region of the carapace of a crab, behind and to one side of the mesobranchial division, called the metabranchial lobe. See cut under Brachyura.

metabrushite (met-ą-brush′īt), n. [< Gr. μετά, along with, + E. brushite.] In mineral., a calcium phosphate allied to brushite, found in the guano of Sombrero, West Indies.

Metacanthidæ (met-ą-kan′thi-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Douglas and Scott, 1865), < Metacanthus + -idæ.] A family of heteropterous insects, typified by the genus Metacanthus. They have the head long, the crown quadrangular, the sides lobe-like, the first antennal joint clavate, the fourth fusiform, and the corium opaque with large transverse depressions between the strong veins.

Metacanthus (met-ą-kan′thus), n. [NL. (Costa, 1848), < Gr. μετά, beyond, + κανθός, the corner of the eye: see canthus, cant[1].] The typical genus of Metacanthidæ, containing a few European bugs. They are chiefly characterized by the small triangular vertical face, globose eyes, and large distant ocelli.

★metacarpal (met-ą-kär′pal), a. and n. [< metacarpus + -al.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the metacarpus or a metacarpal.—Metacarpal saw, a narrow-bladed saw for dividing the metacarpal (or metatarsal) bones.

II. n. One of the bones of the metacarpus. They are not more than five in number, and are reckoned as first, etc., from the radial or thumb side to the other. When reduced in number they always disappear from the sides, so that when but three are left the first and fifth are gone; when there is but one it is the third or middle metacarpal. Two or more may fuse into one bone, as in the metacarpus of a cloven-footed quadruped, as the ox. In recent birds, all of which have three ankylosed metacarpals, the compound bone is further complicated by fusion with it of certain carpal bones, constituting a carpometacarpus, like the tarsometatarsus of the foot.

metacarpale (met″ą-kär-pā′lē), n.; pl. metacarpalia (-li-ą). [NL.: see metacarpal.] A metacarpal bone; one of the metacarpals.

metacarpophalangeal (met-ą-kär″pō-fā-lan′jē-ąl), a. [< metacarpus + phalanges + -al.] Pertaining to the metacarpus and the phalanges.

★metacarpus (met-ą-kär′pus), n.; pl. metacarpi (-pī) [NL. (cf. Gr. μετακάρπιον, the part of the hand between the wrist and the fingers), < Gr. μετά, beyond, + καρπός, the wrist.] In anat., the second segment of the manus or terminal division of the fore limb of a vertebrate, considered with reference to its bony structure; the segment which comes between the carpus and the phalanges, corresponding to the metatarsus of the foot. In man the metacarpus corresponds to the part of the hand between the wrist and the fingers or thumb, and has five metacarpal bones. In the horse it is the part of the fore leg between the so-called knee and the fetlock-joint, and has but one functional bone.

metacellulose (met-ą-sel′ū-lōs), n. [< Gr. μετά, beyond, + E. cellulose.] Same as fungus-cellulose.

★metacenter, metacentre (met-ą-sen′tėr), n. [< F. métacentre, < Gr. μετά, beyond, + κέντρον, center.] The point at which an upward thrust could be equivalent to the pressure of water upon a floating body which has received a slight rotational displacement about one of the principal axes of its section of flotation. The equilibrium is stable or unstable according as the metacenter is above or below the center of gravity. The term is specifically applied to the point where the vertical line passing through the center of buoyancy of a ship, in the position of equilibrium, meets the vertical drawn through the new center of buoyancy when the ship is slightly inclined from the position of equilibrium. The term was introduced into hydrostatics by Pierre Bouguer, a French geodesist (1698–1758). Also called center of cavity.

★metacentric (met-ą-sen′trik), a. [< metacenter + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the metacenter.

Generally speaking, decrease in metacentric height is accompanied by a lengthening of the period of an oscillation.
Encyc. Brit., XXI. 818.

metacetone (me-tas′e-tōn), n. [< Gr. μετά, along with, + E. acetone.] A substance obtained by distilling cane-sugar with lime. It was supposed to have the formula $C_8H_{10}O$, but it has been shown to be a mixture of propionic aldehyde, dimethyl-furane, and hydrocarbons.

metachemistry (met-ą-kem′is-tri), n. [< Gr. μετά, beyond, + E. chemistry; formed after the analogy of metaphysics.] Transcendental chemistry; the chemistry or analysis of the most obscure or abstruse things, physical or spiritual.

It [the genesis of idealism] seems an affair of race, or of metachemistry; the vital point being, how far the sense of unity, or instinct of seeking resemblances, predominated.
Emerson, Literature.

metachloral (met-ą-klō′ral), n. [< Gr. μετά, along with, + E. chloral.] A white tasteless solid body, insoluble in water, formed when chloral is kept for some time in contact with strong sulphuric acid. It is a polymerid of chloral. It seems to resemble chloral hydrate in its pharmacodynamic properties.

metachoanite (met-ą-kō′ą-nīt), a. and n. [< NL. Metachoanites, q. v.] I. a. Having retrorse septal funnels, as a nautiloid; belonging to the Metachoanites.

II. n. A cephalopod of the group Metachoanites.

Metachoanites (met-ą-kō-ą-nī′tēz), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μετά, behind, + χοάνη, a funnel: see choana, choanite.] A group of holochoanoid nautiloid cephalopods whose septal funnels are retrorse: contrasted with Prochoanites. Hyatt, Proc. Bost. Soc. Nat. Hist., 1883, p. 260.

metachronism (me-tak′rō-nizm), n. [= F. metachronisme; < Gr. μετάχρονος, after the time, < μετά, beyond, + χρόνος, time. Cf. anachronism.] An error committed in chronology by placing an event after its real date.

metachrosis (met-ą-krō′sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μεταχρωννύναι, change the color of a thing, < μετά, beyond, + χρωννύναι, later form of χρώζειν, tinge, stain (> χρῶσις, a coloring, tinting), < χροιά, χρόα, surface, skin, color.] Color-change, as that of a chameleon.

metacinnabarite (met-ą-sin′ą-bär-īt), n. [< Gr. μετά (see meta-) + E. cinnabar + -ite[2].] Native mercuric sulphid, crystallizing in tetrahedral crystals, resembling those of the zinc sulphid sphalerite, also massive of a black or grayish-black color: found with red mercuric sulphid cinnabar in California and elsewhere.

metacism (met′ą-sizm), n. [< LL. metacismus.] 1. In Latin, the placing of a word ending in m before one beginning with a vowel: a blemish in style.—2. Same as mytacism.

metacœlia (met-ą-sē′li-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. μετά, beyond, + κοιλία, a hollow.] The fourth ventricle of the brain. Wilder.

metacœlian (met-ạ-sē′li-ạn), a. [< metacœlia + -an.] Of or pertaining to the metacœlia.

meta- compounds. See meta-.

metacresol (met-ạ-krē′sol), n. [< Gr. μετά, along with, + E. cresol.] A phenol isomeric with cresol.

metacromial (met-a-krō′mi-ạl), a. [< metacromion + -al.] Of or pertaining to the metacromion: as, a metacromial process of the scapula.

metacromion (met-a-krō′mi-on), n.; pl. metacromia (-ạ). [NL., < Gr. μετά, behind, + ἀκρώμιον, a by-form of ἀκρωμία, the point of the shoulder-blade: see acromion.] The posterior one of two processes in which the distal end of the spine of the scapula terminates in some mammals, as the shrews and rabbits.

Dorsal view of Left Scapula of Rabbit, showing Metacromion. (About two thirds natural size.) a, acromion; m, metacromion; g, glenoid fossa; c, coracoid process; v, vertebral border; s, spine.

metacyclic (met-ạ-sik′lik), a. [< Gr. μετά, along with, beyond, + κύκλος, circle: see cyclic.] Relating to a permutation of a number of elements in one cycle.—Metacyclic group. See group[1].

metæ, n. Plural of meta.

metæsthetic, metæsthetism. See metesthetic, metesthetism.

metafacial (met-ạ-fā′shạl), a. [< Gr. μετά, behind, + L. facies, the face: see facial.] Situated behind or at the back of the face or facial region of the skull.—Metafacial angle of Serres. See craniometry.

metagaster (met-ạ-gas′tėr), n. [NL., < Gr. μετά, behind, + γαστήρ, the belly: see gaster[2].] The after-intestine; the secondary and in any way differentiated alimentary canal or digestive tube which is derived from an original primary intestinal cavity, or protogaster. It is the ordinary intestinal canal of vertebrates except Amphioxus.

metagastral (met-ạ-gas′trạl), a. [< metagaster + -al.] Pertaining to the metagaster.

metagastrula (met-ạ-gas′trǫ-lạ), n.; pl. metagastrulæ (-lē). [NL., < Gr. μετά, behind, + NL. gastrula, q. v.] A secondary modified gastrula, of variable form, resulting from any kenogenetic mode of egg-cleavage in which a primitive or palingenetic process is vitiated. See cuts under gastrulation.

Three forms at least of metagastrulæ are recognized—the amphigastrula, the discogastrula, and the perigastrula; they are all collectively distinguished from the archigastrula. Haeckel.

metage (mē′tāj), n. [< mete[1] + -age.] 1. Measurement, especially of coal.

Acts have very lately passed in relation to the admeasurement or metage of coals for the city of Westminster. Defoe, Tour through Great Britain, II. 145. (Davies.)

2. Charge for or price of measuring.

Metageitnion (met-ạ-gīt′ni-on), n. [< Gr. Μεταγειτνιών, the second month of the Athenian year, said to be so called because it was the moving-month, when people 'changed their neighbors,' < μετά, over, + γείτων, neighbor.] The second month of the Athenian calendar, having twenty-nine days, and corresponding to the last part of July and the first part of August.

metagelatin, metagelatine (met-ạ-jel′ạ-tin), n. [< Gr. μετά, along with, + E. gelatin.] In photog., a substance which has been used as a preservative in a certain dry collodion process, consisting of a strong solution of gelatin boiled and cooled several times till it ceases to gelatinize and remains fluid.

metagenesis (met-ạ-jen′e-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μετά, beyond, after, + γένεσις, production: see genesis.] In biol., that modification of parthenogenesis or alternate generation exhibited when an organism passes from the egg to the sexual form through a series of successively generated individuals differing from one another in form: distinguished by Owen from metamorphosis, or the transformation of any one individual by the modification of its form as a whole. Metagenesis of one or another kind is exhibited by some insects, as aphids, in which the process is commonly called parthenogenesis; by various internal parasites, as Distoma (see cuts under cercaria); and strikingly by various hydrozoans. In the last the cycle includes (1) the free-swimming impregnated ovum; (2) the fixation of this ovum to some submerged object and its development into an organism; (3) the formation by such organism of various zooids, as nutritive and generative zooids, unlike each other and unlike the parent, the whole forming a hydroid colony; and (4) the formation by generative zooids of ova, which on being set free complete the cycle. Thus, in a sertularian polyp the ovum is a free-swimming ciliated body, which on fixation develops a mouth and tentacles, and by continued gemmation produces two sets of buds, of which the generative set reproduce the free-swimming ciliated ova. In other polyps, as Corynidæ, the set of generative buds themselves become detached as free medusoids like jelly-fish (see cut under medusoid), whose eggs develop not into bodies like the parent medusoid, but into the polypide or polypidom of the hydroid colony on which they were produced. In the Lucernaridæ a similar metagenesis occurs by fission. Herbert Spencer adopts Owen's metagenesis as one of three kinds of his agamogenesis, and considers it as (1) external, where new individuals bud from unspecialized parts of the parent, and (2) internal, as in the case of the transformations of Distoma. See metamorphosis.

metagenetic (met″ạ-jē-net′ik), a. [< metagenesis, after genetic.] 1. In zoöl., pertaining to, characterized by, or resulting from metagenesis. Owen.—2. In mineral., subsequent in origin: said of certain twin crystals. See twin.

metagenetically (met″ạ-jē-net′i-kạl-i), adv. In a metagenetic manner; by means of metagenesis. Darwin, Animals and Plants, p. 363.

metagenic (met-ạ-jen′ik), a. [< Gr. μεταγενής, born after, < μετά, after, + -γενης, born: see -genous. Cf. metagenetic.] Same as metagenetic.

metagnathism (me-tag′nā-thizm), n. [< metagnath-ous + -ism.] In ornith., the condition of a bird's bill when the points of the mandibles cross each other. See cut under crossbill.

metagnathous (me-tag′nā-thus), a. [< Gr. μετά, beyond, + γνάθος, the jaw.] In ornith., having the tips of the mandibles crossed: as, the metagnathous bill of the red crossbill, Loxia curvirostra. See quotation under epignathous.

metagnostic (met-ag-nos′tik), a. and n. [See metagnostics.] I. a. Metaphysical; in recent use, transcending present knowledge both within and beyond the sphere of sense.

II. n. One who believes in the reality of an absolute being transcending knowledge. [Recent.]

The essayist would substitute the title of Metagnostics instead of Agnostics. J. A. Skilton, in Evolution, p. 227.

metagnosticism (met-ag-nos′ti-sizm), n. [< metagnostic + -ism.] The philosophical doctrine that there is a positive (not merely negative) consciousness of the Absolute: distinguished from agnosticism regarded as maintaining the opposite ground. [Recent.]

metagrammatism (met-ạ-gram′ạ-tizm), n. [< Gr. μεταγραμματισμός, alteration of letters, < μεταγραμματίζειν, alter letters, < μετά, over, + γράμμα(τ-), a letter: see gram[2].] The transposition of the letters of a name so as to form a word or words having some reference to the person named; anagrammatism. Camden.

metagraphy (me-tag′rạ-fi), n. [< Gr. μεταγράφειν, write differently, rewrite, transcribe, < μετά, over, + γράφειν, write: see graphic.] Transcription; transliteration.

His belief in the system of metagraphy as applied to non-European alphabets. Athenæum, No. 3151, p. 340.

metairie (me-tā′rē), n. [< F. métairie, < métayer, one who farms on shares: see metayer.] A farm or piece of land cultivated for a share of its produce.

metal (met′al, often met′l), n. [Formerly metall, mettal, mettall (and mettle, now differentiated in use); < ME. metal, < OF. metal, F. métal = Pr. metal, metalh = Sp. Pg. metal = It. metallo = MLG. metal, metāl = MD. metael, D. metaal = G. metall = Sw. metall = Dan. metal = W. mettel = Gael. meiteal, metal, < L. metallum, a mine, a metal, any mineral, stuff, kind, < Gr. μέταλλον, a mine, a pit or cave where minerals are sought, a quarry, later (only in the deriv. μεταλλικός, metallic) a mineral, metal, ore; origin uncertain; in one view orig. 'ore,' as that which is combined 'with another' substance, < μετά, with, + ἄλλος, another; in another view (and according to the record) orig. a mine or pit as 'a place explored,' < μεταλλᾶν, search after, explore, < μετά, after, + ἄλλος, other. Hence medal, mettle.] 1. An elementary substance, or one which in the present state of chemical science is undecomposable, and which possesses opacity, luster of a peculiar kind (commonly called metallic, because very characteristic of the metals), conductivity for heat and electricity, and plasticity, or capability of being drawn, squeezed, or hammered with change of shape but no loss of continuity. Examples of metals possessing all these qualities, although in varying degree, are gold, silver, copper, iron, lead, and tin, all of which have been known from remote antiquity; and on the characters which they possess the idea of a metal was, and mainly still is, founded. These metals also have a high specific gravity, the lightest of them (tin) being over seven times as dense as water. Of the prehistorically known metals, gold, silver, and copper occur more or less abundantly in the native or metallic form, and must have been noticed, and in all probability utilized, in the most remote antiquity, by various nations and over widely extended areas. Iron also occurs native, especially in the form of meteoric iron, and in this way may have first become known and utilized. But iron is now, and has been from time immemorial, smelted from its ores in countries which from almost every other point of view than the metallurgical, might properly be regarded as uncivilized. The use of iron other than meteoric was not, however, known in the New World before the advent of Europeans. Tin and lead do not occur in the metallic form in nature, unless in very minute quantity; hence, where used, these metals must have been obtained by the metallurgic treatment of their ores. In the case of tin and zinc, as well as of other metals not occurring native, it was not until long after some knowledge had been attained in regard to the practical use of their ores, either by themselves or as ingredients in various alloys, that any accurate idea was obtained of the metals themselves. Thus, brass was certainly made long before anything definite had been learned in regard to the metal zinc, and it is not at all unlikely that the same was the case with bronze and one of its constituents, tin. In addition to the six metals already mentioned, quicksilver was known to the Greeks and Romans in classical times; and this metal also occurs not infrequently in the metallic form, so that its early discovery is not a matter to excite surprise. The anomalous occurrence of quicksilver as a liquid at the ordinary temperature was the reason why neither Pliny nor Isidore nor Geber included it among the metals; nor was it so included by writers on chemistry and metallurgy until after it had been discovered that this fluid could be frozen at a not very low temperature, and that when frozen it was malleable. It was not until the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries that antimony, bismuth, and zinc became known; but their ores had long been in use, although, in the case of the two former metals, only to a very limited extent. The discovery of these metals considerably enlarged the scope of the word metallic, since it became necessary to admit that metals could be brittle; this was still further exemplified in the case of the metal arsenic, discovered in 1694 (its oxidized combinations had long been known and utilized), which, although having a metallic luster, is decidedly brittle. This brittleness of substances otherwise metallic in appearance led to their being placed in a class by themselves as "semi-metals," the idea that malleability was a necessary attribute of a metal having come down from the Arabian chemists, and maintaining its hold for many centuries. About the middle and in the latter half of the eighteenth century the number of known metals was greatly increased. In 1741 platina was discovered, but the metals which are always associated with it—osmium, iridium, rhodium, ruthenium, etc.—were not detected until much later. At about the same time as platina, nickel and cobalt were recognized as elements—that is, were first separated and distinguished from their ores, which had been long known and (in the case of cobalt, at least) utilized to a limited extent. Toward the end of the eighteenth century manganese, molybdena, tellurium, uranium, titanium, and chromium became known. About the beginning of the nineteenth century several of the metals of the platina family—palladium, iridium, osmium, rhodium—were separated from the complex alloy known as native platina. Up to this time all the known substances to which the name metal was applied were much heavier than water, and also decidedly heavier than those considered as non-metallic. Hence, as the old and long-prevailing idea that all metals were malleable had been done away with, a high specific gravity began to be considered as their most important characteristic. Thus we find Cronstedt, who was one of the earliest systematic writers on mineralogy (the first edition of his work was published in 1758), defining metals as "those mineral bodies which with respect to their volume are the heaviest of all hitherto known bodies." With the discovery, by Davy, in 1807, of the metallic nature of the bases of the alkalis a great change took place in this respect, for these substances, metallic from many points of view, especially with reference to their chemical affinities, are lighter than water, and at first, on this account, were by some chemists not admitted to rank as metals. The discovery of the metallic bases of the alkalis was followed by that of the bases of the earths—calcium, barium, and strontium, 1807; zirconium, 1824; aluminium, glucinium, and yttrium, 1828. These metals are all light as compared with the older metals, but heavy in comparison with the metallic bases of the alkalis, the lightest of which—lithium, discovered in 1818—has only a little more than half the specific gravity of water. Cadmium, another heavy metal associated with zinc in its mode of occurrence and of some importance in the arts, was also separated from its oxid in 1818. Many metals have been discovered within the past few years, all of great interest from the scientific point of view, but no one of them of economical importance, or occurring in sufficient quantity to be utilized to any extent even if possessing valuable properties. So doubtful and difficult are the chemical reactions of some of these elements that their exact number cannot be stated. Several have been worked over by chemists for years without any definite conclusion having been reached; several, after having been accepted for a while, have been dropped from the list. There are about seventy generally recognized elements (see element), although some three or four of these may still be considered as more or less doubtful. Of the seventy thirteen are decidedly non-metallic; these are sulphur, phosphorus, fluorin, chlorin, iodine, bromine, silicon, boron, carbon, nitrogen, hydrogen, oxygen, and selenium; all the other elements are considered to be metals, and selenium was formerly generally so considered, but latterly it has been decidedly included among the non-metals, and the name has been changed by some to selenion, to make it correspond with carbon, boron, and silicon, with which elements it is to a certain extent chemically affiliated. Tellurium, on the other hand, although closely related chemically to sulphur and selenium, has always been classed among the metals, chiefly because, although brittle, it has a decided metallic luster. The names of the metals, so far as is possible, all end in -um; even platina is frequently written platinum. A division of the elements into metals and non-metals is recognized by chemists at the present time as being rather a matter of convenience from the popular point of view than as one capable of exact scientific definition. The words metallic and metal, however, cannot be dispensed with in common life and the arts, and their use can very rarely lead to any confusion. The exceptions to this general statement that the metals have a "metallic" luster, and that the non-metals do not, are, on the whole, extremely insignificant. Only in the case of selenium and phosphorus in certain of their allotropic forms could there be any question as to whether the term metallic luster could properly be used with reference to a non-metal.

2. In printing and type-founding. See type-metal.—3. The material of glass, pottery, etc., in a state of fusion.

If no tongues of flame make their appearance, the calcination is complete. The contents of the pot are then shovelled out, and allowed to cool and harden into what is technically called metal or "prussiate cake."
Spons' Encyc. Manuf., I. 270.

White glass or enamel is made by adding either arsenic or the oxide of tin to the melted metal.
Workshop Receipts, 1st ser., p. 54.

4. pl. The rails of a railway. [Colloq.]

He stood obstinately on the metals until the train came up and cut him to pieces.
C. Marvin, Gates of Herat, p. 95.

5. In her., one of the two tinctures or and argent—that is, gold and silver.—6. Materials for roads; especially, the broken stones used as ballasting on a road-bed or railway.—7. The aggregate number, mass, or effective power of the guns carried by a ship of war.

Oblige me by looking that British man-of-war well over. Does she carry more metal than the President?
Josiah Quincy, Figures of the Past, p. 232.

8. That of which anything is composed; formative material; hence, constitution; intrinsic quality, as of a person.

As his minde is tempered and qualified, so are his speeches and language at large, and his inward conceits be the mettall of his minde, and his manner of vtterance the very warp and woofe of his conceits.
Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 124.

Sir, I am made
Of the self-same metal that my sister is.
Shak., Lear, i. 1. 71.

9. Courage; spirit; mettle. In this sense now always mettle.

Being glad to find their companions had so much metal, after a long debate the major part carried it.
Clarendon, Civil War.

10†. A mine. Davies.

It was impossible to live without our king but as slaves live: that is, such as are visibly dead, and persons condemned to metals.
Jer. Taylor, Ductor Dubitantium, Ep. Ded.

Aich metal, or Aich's metal, an alloy of about two parts of zinc with three of copper, to which about two per cent. of iron is added. This alloy is very malleable at a red heat, and can be hammered, rolled, or drawn into fine wire. It has been used in Austria for cannon, and is believed to have been known to the Chinese.—Antifriction metals. See antifriction.—Babbitt metal. [Named from Isaac Babbitt, the inventor (1799–1862).] An alloy of tin with copper and antimony, used for bearings, bushings, or pillow-blocks. This alloy consists of 83 per cent. of tin, the remaining 17 per cent. being made up of the two other metals. Sometimes called babbitting.—Base metals, in metal., the metals not classed as noble, especially lead, zinc, copper, and iron.—Bath metal. [Named from Bath, England.] A white brass consisting of 55 parts of copper and 45 of zinc. The name is also given to other combinations of the same metals.—Blue metal. (a) A well-sinkers' name for blue clay. (b) See blue.—Bowl-metal, a name given to antimony in the second stage of the English smelting process of that metal.—Britannia metal, an alloy containing tin, antimony, and copper, to which bismuth, zinc, and lead are occasionally added. The essential metal is tin, which usually constitutes nine tenths or more of the mass, the antimony and copper being added to give the desired hardness. This alloy is extensively used for table-ware, being usually, for that purpose, covered with a thin coating of silver, and sold as silver-plate. In the best plated ware, however, the silver is laid on a body of German silver.—Coarse metal, the technical name of the product of the second operation in the process of smelting mixed cupriferous ores in Great Britain, especially at Swansea. The product of this operation, which is performed in a reverberatory furnace, is a matte or regulus containing iron and copper in combination with sulphur in about the same proportion in which they are present in copper pyrites, together with slag.—Composition metal. See composition.—Dutch metal, See Dutch.—Fusible metal, a metallic alloy that fuses at a very low temperature. Such alloys are usually composed of lead, tin, and bismuth. Among those best known are—Newton's metal, containing 8 parts of bismuth, 5 of lead, and 3 of tin, which fuses at 202°; Rose's metal, 2 parts of bismuth, 1 each of tin and lead, fusing at 201°; and an alloy of 5 parts of bismuth, 3 of lead, and 2 of tin, fusing at 197°. The addition of cadmium to alloys of bismuth, tin, and lead lowers their fusing-point considerably. Thus, if from 8 to 10 per cent. of cadmium is added to Rose's metal, the melting-point is reduced to 167°. The alloys known as Wood's and Wood and Lipinsky's metals are such alloys of cadmium, bismuth, tin, and lead. One of these, containing cadmium 4 parts, and tin, lead, and bismuth each 5 parts, melts at 150°. The addition of mercury to fusible alloys like Newton's and Rose's metals is said also to lower their fusing-point considerably.—Gathered metal. See laded metal, under lade[1].—Gedges's metal. Same as Aich metal.—Heavy metal. See heavy[1].—Kier's metal, a gun-metal composed of 100 parts of copper, 75 of zinc, and 10 of iron.—Laded metal. See lade[1].—Light metal, any metal of which the specific gravity is less than 5.—Magnetic metals, iron, nickel, cobalt, manganese (and chromium ?).—Muntz's metal. [Named from Mr. Muntz of Birmingham, the inventor.] Yellow metal; an alloy of 3 parts of copper and 2 of zinc, differing from common brass in being malleable when hot. It is cheaper and can be more easily rolled than copper, and has taken its place as the material used for sheathing, formerly one of the most important uses to which copper was put. Yellow metal is its general commercial name. Also called patent metal.—Newton's metal. See fusible metal, above.—Noble or perfect metals, gold, silver, and platinum: so called because when exposed to the air they do not oxidize like other metals, but retain their metallic luster.—Organ- or pipe-metal, an alloy of tin and lead, with or without zinc, used for the construction of organ-pipes. The value of the metal depends principally upon the proportion of tin used, less than 50 per cent. making poor metal. A fair percentage of tin is indicated by a spotted surface, hence good metal is also called spotted metal.—Patent metal. Same as Muntz's metal.—Pimple-metal. See white metal.—Point of fusion of metals. See fusion.—Prince's metal, an alloy said to have been so called because first prepared by Prince Rupert (1619–82), nephew of Charles I. of England, who invented, or at least introduced into England, the so-called "Prince Rupert's drops." There is no certainty in regard to the composition of the alloy called prince's metal. By most writers it is said to have been a kind of brass; others describe it as an alloy of copper and arsenic.—Rose's metal. See fusible metal, above.—To burn metals together. See burn[1].—White metal, the product of the fourth operation in the smelting of mixed cupriferous ores (according to the English process). The object of this stage of the process is to remove the iron, and the work is done in a reverberatory furnace, the third stage having been a calcination of the coarse metal, with the object of converting the sulphuret of iron into an oxid. The product of the fourth operation is variously designated as blue, white, or pimple-metal, according to the percentage of copper contained and the peculiar appearance exhibited. Portions having a smooth lustrous fracture, and containing from 60 to 70 per cent. of copper, are designated as blue metal; those of grayish-white color, with granular fracture, and containing from 75 to 78 per cent. of copper, are called white metal. Pimple-metal is that which contains more than 78 per cent. of copper, and has its surface pimpled from the escape of sulphurous acid gas.—Wood's metal. See fusible metal, above.—Yellow metal. Same as Muntz's metal.

metal (met′al), v. t.; pret. and pp. metaled or metalled, ppr. metaling or metalling. [< metal, n.] To put metal on; cover, as roads, with broken stones or metal.

metal. An abbreviation of metallurgy.

metal-bath (met′al-bȧth), n. See bath[1].

metal-casting (met′al-kȧs″ting), n. 1. The act or process of producing casts in metal by pouring it when in a state of fusion into a mold.—2. A piece of cast metal having a form that adapts it for use in machinery, manufactures, etc.

metaldehyde (me-tal′dē-hīd), n. [< Gr. μετά, with, + E. aldehyde.] A substance into which aldehyde is partially converted in contact with acids at a low temperature. It is a white crystalline solid.

metaled, metalled (met′ald), a. 1. Covered with metal, especially with road-metal or ballast; macadamized: as, newly metaled roads.—2†. Full of fire or ardor; mettled; dazzling; glancing. See mettled.

I hate such measur'd, give me metall'd fire,
That trembles in the blaze, but then mounts higher.
B. Jonson, Epigram to William Earle of Newcastle [on Fencing.

★ metalepsis (met-ą-lep′sis), n. [L., < Gr. μετάληψις, participation, assumption, alternation, < μεταλῆπτός, partaken in, < μεταλαμβάνειν, partake in, < μετά, among, + λαμβάνειν, take.] A rhetorical figure or trope assumed by some ancient writers, and supposed to consist in substituting a word for a synonym or homonym, which latter is at the same time understood in a metaphorical or transferred sense: as, "sable caverns" for "black caverns," this in its turn meaning "dark or gloomy caverns."

The sence is much altered & the hearers conceit strangly entangled by the figure Metalepsis, which I call the farfet.
Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 152.

metalepsy (met′ą-lep-si), n. [< Gr. μετάληψις, alternation: see metalepsis.] In chem., change or variation produced by the displacement of an element or radical in a compound by its chemical equivalent: same as substitution.

metaleptic (met-ą-lep′tik), a. [< Gr. μεταληπτικός, capable of partaking (cf. μετάληψις, participation), < μεταλῆπτός, partaken in: see metalepsis and metalepsy.] 1. Pertaining to a metalepsis or participation; translative.—2. Transverse: as, the metaleptic motion of a muscle.—3. In chem., pertaining to, resulting from, or characterized by metalepsy, or the substitution of one substance for another which has been displaced.

metaleptical (met-ą-lep′ti-kal), a. [< metaleptic + -al.] Same as metaleptic.

metaleptically (met-ą-lep′ti-kal-i), adv. In a metaleptical manner; by transposition.

The name of promises may metaleptically be extended to comminations. Bp. Sanderson, Promissory Oaths, i. § 9.

metal-gage (met′al-gāj), n. A gage used for determining the thickness of sheet-metal. E. H. Knight.

★ metaline (met′al-in), n. [< metal + -ine[2].] 1. A kind of thread for sewing leather, made of twisted strands of linen and brass, copper, or steel wire.—2. A compound for forming a lubricating-surface in journal-boxes. It is made up of metallic oxids, organic materials, wax, and fatty matters.

metaling, metalling (met′al-ing), n. [Verbal n. of metal, v.] The material which forms the road-bed of a macadamized road or of a railway, chiefly broken stones; road-metal.

The air is filled with a choking precipitate of the kunker, or carbonate of lime nodules, which form the metalling of the road. W. H. Russell, Diary in India, I. 145.

metalist, n. See metallist.

metallic (me-tal′ik), a. [= F. métallique = Sp. ★metálico = Pg. It. metallico (cf. D. metalliek, metallisch = G. metallisch = Dan. Sw. metallisk), < L. metallicus, < Gr. μεταλλικός, of or concerning mines or metal, < μέταλλον, a mine (metal): see metal, n.] 1. Consisting of or having the characters of a metal; made up of metal or of an alloy. This word is used to indicate the condition of a metal (see metal) in which it exists by itself, and not mineralized or combined with those substances which take away its metallic character and convert it into an ore, in which the elementary substance exists, but often with characters greatly differing from those which it has when separated from its mineralizers, or reduced to the metallic form.

She said; and lo! a palace towering seems,
With Parian pillars and metallic beams.
W. King, Rufinus, or the Favourite.

Among the most metallic of the metals is a gas.
J. N. Lockyer, Spect. Anal., p. 167.

2. Characteristic of a metal: as, a metallic luster.—3. Having one or more properties resembling those of metals: as, a metallic voice.

A distinct, hollow, metallic, and clangorous, yet apparently muffled, reverberation.
Poe, Fall of the House of Usher.

Metallic-adamantine luster, a variety of luster intermediate between submetallic and adamantine, characteristic of pyrargyrite, some cerusite and octahedrite, etc.—Metallic ammunition, bur, currency, dust, feather. See the nouns.—Metallic beetles, a collectors' name for coleopterous insects of the family Buprestidæ. See cut under Buprestis.—Metallic lath. See lathing[1].—Metallic oxid, a compound of metal and oxygen.—Metallic paper, paper the surface of which is washed over with a solution of whiting, lime, and size. Writing done with a pewter pencil upon such paper is almost indelible.—Metallic salts, those salts which have a metal or metallic oxid for their base, as lead carbonate.—Metallic scales. See metallic feather, under feather.—Metallic standard. See standard.—Metallic tinkling, in pathol., a high-pitched tinkle heard in the lungs in pneumothorax, or in the case of a lung cavity under certain conditions.—Metallic-tissue loom. See loom[1].

metallical† (me-tal′i-kal), a. [< metallic + -al.] Same as metallic.

Now, by electrical bodies, I understand not such as are metallical, mentioned by Pliny and the Antients.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 4.

metallically (me-tal′i-kal-i), adv. As a metal; by means of or by the use of metal; with a metal; as regards metallic properties.

They [two plates of different metals] are metallically connected together. Preece and Sivewright, Telegraphy, p. 8.

Let us conceive a metallically pure cylinder of wrought or cast iron. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXIV. 299.

metallicity (met-ą-lis′i-ti), n. [< metallic + -ity.] The condition of being a metal; metallic character or constitution.

They [the alchemists] held that mercury enters into the composition of all metals, and is the very cause of their metallicity. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 32.

metallifacture (met″al-i-fak′tūr), n. [< L. metallum, a metal, + factura, a making: see facture.] The manufacture of metals. [Rare.]

metalliferous (met-ą-lif′e-rus), a. [= F. métallifère = Sp. metalífero; < L. metallifer, yielding metals, < metallum, a metal, + ferre = E. bear[1].]

Producing or yielding metal: as, metalliferous deposits or veins; a metalliferous district.

metalliform (me-tal'i-fôrm), a. [= F. métalliforme; < L. metallum, a metal, + forma, form.] Having the form or properties of metal; like metal.

metallify (me-tal'i-fī), v. t.; pret. and pp. metallified, ppr. metallifying. [< metal + -i-fy.] To convert into metal.

The Augustin process of silver extraction is only a peculiar mode of metallifying and collecting the silver of an ore after it has been by some preliminary operation converted into chloride or sulphate. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 70.

metallikon (me-tal'i-kon), n. [< Gr. μεταλλικόν, neut. of μεταλλικός, of metal, metallic: see metallic.] An English architectural surface-decoration, consisting of glass plates on which are cemented ornaments of glass, terra-cotta, etc.

metalline (met'a-lin), a. [= F. métallin = It. metallino; as metal + -ine[1].] Of a metallic nature or quality; consisting of or like metal; containing metal: as, metalline water.

The quicksilver . . . [was] by this means brought to appear a very close and lovely metalline cylinder, not interrupted by interspersed bubbles as before. Boyle, Works, I. 49.

metalling, n. See metaling.

metallist, metalist (met'a-list), n. [< metal (L. metallum) + -ist.] 1. A worker in metals, or one skilled in the knowledge of metals.

The skilful metallist, that findeth and refineth those precious veines for publike use, is rewarded, is honoured. Bp. Hall, Epistles, v. 7.

2. An advocate of the use of metal (silver or gold) as currency. Compare bimetallist, monometallist.

Perhaps for this reason he has recently reaped a golden harvest by carrying out the principles of the silver metallists. Science, VIII. 75.

metallization (met″a-li-zā'shon), n. [= F. métallisation = Sp. metalización = Pg. metallização; as metallize + -ation.] The act or process of metallizing, or forming or transforming into a metal. Also spelled metallisation.—Metallization of wood, the impregnation of wood with an inorganic substance, by which the pores become so completely filled that the wood acquires, to a certain extent, the qualities of a mineral.

metallize (met'a-līz), v. t.; pret. and pp. metallized, ppr. metallizing. [= F. métalliser = Sp. metalizar = Pg. metallizar; as metal + -ize.] To form or transform into metal; render metallic. Also spelled metallise.—Metallized glass. See glass.

metallochrome (me-tal'ō-krōm), n. [< Gr. μέταλλον, a metal, + χρῶμα, color.] A beautiful prismatic tinting imparted by electrolytic action to polished steel plates by depositing on them a thin film of oxid of lead.

metallochromy (met'a-lō-krō″mi), n. [As metallochrome + -y[3].] The art or process of coloring metals.

Metallo-chromy is used to produce decorative effects upon objects of copper, tombac, and brass, previously treated to a thin electro-gilding. W. H. Wahl, Galvanoplastic Manipulations, p. 407.

★metallographic (met″a-lō-graf'ik), a. [< metallograph-y + -ic.] Of or pertaining to metallography.

metallographist (met-a-log'ra-fist), n. [< metallograph-y + -ist.] A writer on metallography.

metallography (met-a-log'ra-fi), n. [= F. métallographie = Sp. metalografía = Pg. metallographia, < Gr. μέταλλον, a metal, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] 1. An account of metals, or a treatise on metallic substances; the science of metals.—2. A process of decorating metals. It consists of a simple system of printing from wooden blocks in acids, in such manner as to produce an imitation of the grain of the wood.

3. A method of engraving, allied to lithography, in which metallic plates are substituted for stones.

metalloid (met'a-loid), a. and n. [= F. métalloïde; < Gr. μέταλλον, metal, + εἶδος, form.] I. a. Relating to metalloids; like metal; having the form or appearance of a metal.

II. n. In chem., a term which has been variously applied: as, (a) to the metallic bases of the fixed alkalis and alkaline earths, probably in consequence of their low specific gravity; and (b) to all the non-metallic elementary substances. In the latter sense it is now used by chemists. The metalloids are thirteen in number: oxygen, hydrogen, nitrogen, carbon, chlorin, bromine, iodine, fluorin, sulphur, selenium, phosphorus, boron, and silicon. The distinction between a metal and a metalloid is, however, purely artificial, being based on physical rather than chemical criteria; but, broadly, a metal may be said to differ from a metalloid in being an excellent conductor of heat and electricity, in reflecting light more or less powerfully, and in being electropositive. Though a metalloid may possess one or more of these characters, it will not be found to unite them all. Berzelius, in his classification, restricts the term metalloid to the inflammable non-metallic elements—sulphur, phosphorus, carbon, and boron. See element, 3, and metal, 1.

metalloidal (met-a-loi'dal), a. [< metalloid + -al.] Of or pertaining to a metalloid or metalloids; of the nature of a metalloid.

Long heat-waves in their action upon metalloidal molecules only produce bands and fluted spaces. J. N. Lockyer, Spect. Anal., p. 175.

metallophone (me-tal'ō-fōn), n. [< Gr. μέταλλον, a metal, + φωνή, a sound.] 1. A pianoforte with graduated metal bars instead of strings.—2. An instrument like the xylophone, but with metallic instead of wooden bars.

metalloplastic (met″a-lō-plas'tik), a. [< Gr. μέταλλον, metal, + πλάσσειν, mold, form.] Pertaining to the arts of depositing metals or obtaining metal casts by either electric or chemical methods.

metalloscopic (met″a-lō-skop'ik), a. [< metalloscop-y + -ic.] Of or pertaining to metalloscopy.

Metal[l]oscopic phenomena are most analogous to those here described. Amer. Jour. Psychol., I. 503.

metalloscopy (met'a-lō-skō″pi), n. [< Gr. μέταλλον, metal, + σκοπεῖν, view.] The art of determining by external application what metals or metallic substances act most easily and favorably upon a given person. Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, IV. 749.

metallotherapeutic (met″a-lō-ther-a-pū'tik), a. Pertaining to metallotherapy.

metallotherapy (met'a-lō-ther″a-pi), n. [< Gr. μέταλλον, metal, + θεραπεία, medical treatment.] The treatment of disease by the external application of metals. First formulated as a system by Burq in 1848, and hence often called Burqism, it has been recently revived by Charcot. Simple disks of various metals are employed in contact with the external parts of the body, from which different therapeutic results are claimed. Other observers assert that all the phenomena described as following the application of metals may be produced by disks of wood, and that whatever curative results are attained are due to mental effects, rather than to any special virtues emanating from the metals themselves.

metallurgic (met-a-lėr'jik), a. [= F. métallurgique = Sp. metalúrgico = Pg. metallurgico, < NL. metallurgicus, < metallurgia, metallurgy: see metallurgy.] Pertaining to metallurgy, or the art of working metals.—Metallurgic chemistry, the part of chemistry relating to the extraction and working of metals.

metallurgical (met-a-lėr'ji-kal), a. [< metallurgic + -al.] Relating to or connected with metallurgy; belonging to the working of metals: as, metallurgical investigations or pursuits.

metallurgically (met-a-lėr'ji-kal-i), adv. By metallurgical methods; as regards metallurgy.

metallurgist (met'al-ėr-jist), n. [= F. métallurgiste = Sp. metalurgista = Pg. metallurgista; as metallurg-y + -ist.] One who is versed in the science of metallurgy; one who scientifically studies the operations of the smelter.

★metallurgy (met'al-ėr-ji), n. [= F. métallurgie = Sp. metalurgia = Pg. It. metallurgia, < NL. metallurgia, < Gr. μεταλλουργός, working metals, a miner, < μέταλλον, a mine (metal), + ἔργον, work.] The science of extracting metals from their ores. It involves chemical reactions which require either that the ore be fused by heat, or treated in solution. When heating or fusion is used the process is called smelting. In smelting, the metals are separated by known methods from the mineralizing substances with which, with few exceptions, they naturally occur combined. Smelting implies the use of fire, or separation of the metal in the dry way, but processes carried on in the humid way are not unfrequently employed in the treatment of metalliferous ores. This is not ordinarily called smelting, but metallurgical treatment. The ores of many mining regions are treated at or near the place where they are mined, but it is not at all uncommon for ores to be carried to a great distance to be smelted. Thus, until within a few years, a large part of the copper used in the world was smelted at Swansea, in Wales, from ores brought from various countries, metallurgical skill and the command of cheap fuel making it desirable to have the ore treated there rather than at the place where it was mined. Abbreviated metal.

metalman† (met'al-man), n. [< metal + man.] A worker in metals; a coppersmith or tinman.

A smith, or a metalman, the pot's never from his nose. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 110.

metalogic (met-a-loj'ik), n. [< Gr. μετά, after, + E. logic.] The part of metaphysics which concerns logic.

metalogical (met-a-loj'i-kal), a. [As metalogic + -al.] Beyond the province of logic; transcending the sphere of logic.

metal-plane (met'al-plān), n. A form of plane used to face soft metal plates by taking fine shavings from them. The angle of the cutter with the sole is adapted to the hardness of the metal to be worked.

metal-saw (met'al-sâ), n. A hard steel saw with fine teeth, stretched in a frame and used for sawing metal.

metal-wheel (met'al-hwēl), n. In grinding and polishing, a lap.

metal-work (met'al-wėrk), n. Work, especially artistic work, in metal.

metamathematics (met-a-math-ē-mat'iks), n. [< Gr. μετά, after, + μαθηματικά, mathematics.] The metaphysics of mathematics; the philosophy of non-Euclidean geometry and the like.

metamer (met'a-mėr), n. [See metamere.] A compound which is metameric, or exhibits the property of metamerism.

The two methyl and ethyl metamers seem distinguishable. Philos. Mag., XXV. 235.

metamera, n. Plural of metameron.

metameral (met'a-mē-ral), a. [< metamere + -al.] 1. Pertaining to or comprising metameres; having correspondence or agreement between parts.—2. In zoöl., same as metameric.

metamere (met'a-mēr), n. [Also metameron; < Gr. μετά, after, + μέρος, a part.] In zoöl., one of a longitudinal series of parts which are serially homologous with one another. See metameric, metamerism. The construction of bilaterally symmetrical bodies by metamerism is common and usual in the animal kingdom, and is exhibited in such diversity of details that metameres have received several different names. The most general name is segment; but, since several morphologically distinct metameres may coalesce in one segment, the stricter term for an individual metamere, such as each morphological segment or ring of an annelid, crustacean, insect, or other articulate animal, is somite or arthromere. A morphological metamere of a vertebrate has been called a diarthromere. Compare actinomere and antimere.—Ambulacral metameres. See ambulacral.

metameric (met-a-mer'ik), a. [As metamere + -ic.] 1. In chem., pertaining to or characterized by metamerism.—2. In zoöl., of or pertaining to a metamere or metamerism; being a metamere, or resulting from metamerism; situated in the long axis of the body as one of a longitudinal series of like parts; segmental; somitic.

metamerically (met-a-mer'i-kal-i), adv. So as to be metameric; in or by way of metamerism; as a metamere.

metamerism (met'a-mē-rizm), n. [As metamere + -ism.] 1. In chem., a form of isomerism, that relation of certain compound bodies by which they have the same chemical elements combined in the same proportion and with the same molecular weight, while differing in chemical properties. Thus, aldehyde and ethylene oxid have their elements in the same proportion, C_2H_4O, and the same molecular weight, 44, but are very different in their chemical properties. Two metameric bodies may or may not belong to the same class or series of compounds. See isomerism, polymerism.

2. In zoöl., a metameric condition; the state of being metameric; segmentation of the body of an animal along the primary or longitudinal axis, resulting in a series of more or less similar consecutive parts which are serially homologous. See metamere, antimere.

metamerization (met-a-mer-i-zā'shon), n. [< metamerize + -ation.] Division into metameres.

A very regular internal metamerization. Encyc. Brit., XVII. 328.

metamerize (met'a-mē-rīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. metamerized, ppr. metamerizing. [< metamere + -ize.] To make metamerous; divide into metameres.

Although the vertebrate body is a metameric one, this archinephric duct is not a metamerized organ. Gegenbaur, Comp. Anat. (trans.), p. 602.

metameron (me-tam'ē-ron), n.; pl. metamera (-rä). [NL.: see metamere.] Same as metamere.

metamerous (met'a-mēr-us), a. [As metamere + -ous.] Same as metameral and metameric, 2. A. A. W. Hubrecht, Micros. Science, XXVII. 613.

metamery (met'a-mē-ri), n. [As metamere + -y[3].] The condition of being metameric; metamerism. A. A. W. Hubrecht, Micros. Science, XXVII. 610.

★metamorphic (met-a-môr'fik), a. [= F. métamorphique; as Gr. μετά, among (denoting interchange), + μορφή, form, + -ic. Cf. metamorphosis.] 1. Producing metamorphosis; changing the form or structure; transforming: as, a metamorphic cause or agency; metamorphic action.—2. Exhibiting metamorphosis or metamorphism; changed in form or structure; metamorphosed.—Metamorphic rocks, in geol. See metamorphism.

phosing, or changing the form or structure; specifically, chemical change and rearrangement of the constituents of a rock by which they are made to assume new forms and enter into new combinations, the most important result of these changes being that the rock becomes harder and more crystalline in structure. Thus, the metamorphic slates are crystalline schists. The sedimentary rocks, especially those made up of the debris of feldspathic minerals, are those most liable to undergo metamorphism; hence it is that the argillaceous rocks offer the most conspicuous examples of this process, and it is these which are most altered in external characters by it, foliation and slaty cleavage being often highly developed in the process. Volcanic rocks also are subject to metamorphic changes, although the results are usually much less conspicuous to the eye unaided by a microscope than in the case of the sedimentary deposits. Examples of metamorphism are the conversion of ordinary earthy limestone into crystalline marble, of argillaceous shales into various kinds of schists (mica-schist, talc-schist, etc.), and of sandstone into quartzite. Closely connected with the phenomena of metamorphism is the development in a rock of a slaty cleavage or of a foliated structure. Metamorphic agencies and the results which they have brought about have been much studied of late years by geologists, and the modern methods of lithological research have been most important aids in this direction. The most obvious and generally accepted classification of metamorphic action is into "contact" and "regional" metamorphism. In the case of contact metamorphism the changes observed are apparently due — in large part, at least — to the presence of an adjacent mass of rock, usually of an intrusive character, as when the strata are seen to have been altered along the walls of a dike. In the case of regional metamorphism, when large masses of rock are found to have been affected and rendered crystalline without any special cause being visible in the form of adjacent intrusive or igneous material, the phenomena are more difficult of explanation than in the case of contact metamorphism. In the course of the numerous discussions of this subject a great number of new terms have been introduced, the meaning of which is, owing to the complexity of the phenomena and the imperfection of the observations, often rather obscure; some of these terms may here be cited. As synonyms of "regional" metamorphism, the epithets "normal" and "general" have been used by some authors, while others have indicated a desire to specialize in their application. Thus, Prestwich limits "normal metamorphism" to the changes due to central heat, and "regional metamorphism" to changes effected by the heat produced locally within the crust of the earth by transformation into heat of the mechanical work of compression or of crushing of parts of the earth. Bonney desires to reserve the phrase "regional metamorphism" for those ancient rocks occupying extensive areas of the earth's surface "which, whatever be their history, are in all probability by no means in their original condition." Dana prefers "local" to "contact," but does not use the two exactly as synonyms, since he makes local "include changes due to heated emanations and other conditions where there are no contacts" — in other words, he uses "local" rather as the opposite of "general," ignoring the idea embodied in the term "contact," namely that a visible cause of the observed metamorphism is present in the form of an adjacent mass of intrusive or heterogeneous rock. Kinahan proposes "metapepsis" and "paroptesis" as the synonyms of regional and contact metamorphism. "Why we need go to the Greek for [the] two words is not clear." (Dana.) Many geologists are of the opinion that the movements which the rocks composing the earth's crust have undergone in certain regions, which movements must necessarily have been accompanied by pressure, stress, shearing, or "flow," have been among the most important causes of metamorphic change. The most comprehensive term by which metamorphism originating in conditions of this kind has been designated is that introduced by Rosenbusch, "dynamical." Other writers on this subject have used as being nearly or quite synonymous with "dynamical" the following: "pressure," "compression," "mechanical," "friction," "dislocation." Judd has introduced the term "statical metamorphism" as indicating changes which may have taken place in deep-seated rocks quite independently of any movement to which they have been subjected. As designating and discriminating between various kinds of metamorphic changes, with special reference to the character of the results produced, Dana has introduced the terms "crystallinic," "paramorphic," and "metachemic." The first of these implies a simple development of a crystalline condition in the original material, such, for instance, as takes place in the conversion of limestone into marble ("marmarosis" of Geikie); the second, a change from one paramorphic state to another, as from augite to hornblende; the third, a change through chemical transformations, as of chrysolite to serpentine. "Metasomatic metamorphism" (or, in one word, "metasomatosis") and "methylosis" are terms which have been suggested in this connection, but which have met with little favor; they were apparently intended by their authors to include chemical changes similar to those which take place in the formation of pseudomorphs, and are allied to the "metachemic" of Dana. "Metastasis" and "metacrasis" are terms which have been coined, but have not become current — the one to denote changes somewhat similar to those included by Dana under "crystallinic," the other (as defined by that author) to "denote changes like the conversion of a mass of mud into a mass of quartz with mica and other silicates."

metamorphize (met-a-môr′fīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. metamorphized, ppr. metamorphizing. [As metamorph-ic + -ize.] To change; transform; metamorphose. De Quincey.

metamorphology (met″a-môr-fol′ō-ji), n. [< Gr. μεταμόρφ(ωσις), a transformation (see metamorphosis), + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] In biol., the science of the metamorphoses or changes which an individual undergoes from the time it ceases to be an embryo to the time it ceases to live as a bodily organism. Metamorphology and embryology together constitute ontogeny.

As soon as the organism has left [the egg-coverings], it is no longer an embryo. The later changes of this form the subject of the science of metamorphoses, or metamorphology. Haeckel, Evol. of Man (trans.), II. 460.

metamorphopsia (met″a-môr-fop′si-ä), n. [< Gr. μεταμόρφ(ωσις), transformation (see metamorphosis), + ὤψ, eye.] A pathological condition of the eyes in which objects appear elongated, irregular, or confused.

metamorphoscope (met-a-môr′fō-skōp), n. [< Gr. μεταμόρφ(ωσις), transformation (see metamorphosis), + σκοπεῖν, view.] A toy in which pictured forms of human beings or other animals are made to interchange heads, bodies, legs, or wearing-apparel. The pictures are drawn or painted on a series of bands of muslin or paper, each having independent motion on rollers in a box, and each of a different length from the others. The bands are arranged with their edges as near together as possible, and the figures are painted across the entire series. The motion of the bands is made constantly to displace the parts of the different figures and recombine them in ludicrous fashion at a slot in the cover of the box.

metamorphose† (met-a-môr′fōs), n. [< F. métamorphose = Sp. metamorfósis or metamórfosis = Pg. metamorphose = It. metamorfose, < L. metamorphosis, < Gr. μεταμόρφωσις, a transformation: see metamorphosis.] A transformation in shape or character; metamorphosis.

My metamorphose is not held unfit.
Middleton, Family of Love, iv. 2.

metamorphose (met-a-môr′fōz), v. t.; pret. and pp. metamorphosed, ppr. metamorphosing. [= F. métamorphoser; < metamorphose, n., metamorphosis.] To change into a different form; alter or modify the shape or character of; transform; transmute.

Thus men (my lord) be metamorphosed,
From seemely shape, to byrds, and ougly beasts.
Gascoigne, Complaint of Philomene.

Thou, Julia, thou hast metamorphosed me.
Shak., T. G. of V., i. 1. 66.

The priest was metamorphosed into knight.
Browning, Ring and Book, I. 186.

=Syn. Transmute, etc. See transform.

metamorphoser (met-a-môr′fō-zėr), n. One who or that which metamorphoses.

What shall I name this man but a beastly metamorphoser, both of himself and of others?
Gascoigne, Delicate Diet for Droonkardes.

metamorphosic (met″a-môr-fō′sik), a. [< metamorphose + -ic.] Causing metamorphosis; transforming; relating to or depicting metamorphoses.

All the metamorphosic fables of the ancients, turning policied and commercial people into horrid and savage monsters, will, like clouds before the sun, dispel and evaporate before the light of truth.
Pownall, On Antiquities, p. 69. (Latham.)

★ metamorphosis (met-a-môr′fō-sis), n.; pl. metamorphoses (-sēz). [Formerly also metamorphose, q. v.; < L. metamorphosis, < Gr. μεταμόρφωσις, a transformation, < μεταμορφοῦσθαι, be transformed, < μετά, over, + μορφή, form, shape.] 1. Change of form or structure; transmutation or transformation. Used most frequently in literature with reference to the old or poetic conception of a miraculous transmutation of a person, animal, or thing into a different and often antagonistic or contrasting form, either with or without a corresponding change of nature.

With Severne she along doth go,
Her Metamorphosis to show.
Drayton, Polyolbion, vi., Arg.

I wondered at such a Metamorphosis in so short a time; he told me it was for the Death of his Wife that Nature had thus antedated his Years. Howell, Letters, I. iv. 28.

Where is the gloriously decisive change,
The immeasurable metamorphosis
Of human clay to divine gold?
Browning, Ring and Book, II. 217.

2. A marked change in the form or function of a living body; a transformation resulting from development; specifically, in zoöl., the course of alteration which an animal undergoes after its exclusion from the egg, and which modifies extensively the general form and life of the individual; particularly, in entom., the transformations of a metabolous insect.

The term metamorphosis, in its technical entomological sense, is applied only to that succession of changes of which . . . a definite pupal condition forms the middle term. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 361.

3. In chem., that chemical action by which a given compound is caused, by the presence of a peculiar substance, to resolve itself into two or more compounds, as sugar, by the presence of yeast, into alcohol and carbonic acid.—4. In bot., the various changes that are brought about in plant-organs, whereby they appear under changed or modified conditions, as when stamens are metamorphosed into petals, or stipules into leaves. Metamorphosis does not imply that the petal, for example, has ever been a stamen, but it implies an alteration in the organizing force, which took effect at a very early period in the life of the organ, at or before the time when the primitive aggregation of cells became differentiated into the several parts of which it is normally composed. It is due merely to the fact that the development of the organ has pursued a different course from what is usual. The various kinds of metamorphoses are described under the names of chlorosis, petalody, phyllody, pistillody, sepalody, staminody, etc. (which see). —Coarctate metamorphosis. See coarctate.—Complete metamorphosis. See holometaboly and complete. —Imperfect or incomplete metamorphosis. See hemimetaboly and imperfect.—Metamorphosis of organs, in bot., the progressive adaptation of one organ to several different purposes, connected with which are changes in size, color, and other particulars. Thus, all the parts of a plant are reducible to the axis and its appendages, the other parts developing themselves from these. See morphology.—Progressive metamorphosis, transformation from a lower or more simple to a higher or more complex substance; anabolism.—Retrogressive metamorphosis, transformation from a higher or more complex to a lower or more simple substance; catabolism. Oftener called retrograde metamorphosis.=Syn. 1. See transform, v. t.

metamorphostical† (met″a-môr-fos′ti-kal), a. [Irreg. < metamorphosis + -t- + -ic + -al.] Pertaining to or effected by metamorphosis. Pope.

metamorphotic (met″a-môr-fot′ik), a. [< metamorphosis (-ot-) + -ic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of metamorphosis; consisting in transformation.

The epithelial cells lining the uriniferous tubules undergo metamorphotic changes. N. Y. Med. Jour., XL. 402.

Metamorphotic system, in entom., a scheme of classification first proposed by Swammerdam, based on the characters of the metamorphoses and the condition of the larva and pupa, whether resembling the adult or differing from it more or less widely. This scheme, improved by subsequent authors and combined with characters drawn from the study of perfect insects, is the basis of the best modern systems of entomological classification.

metamorphy (met′a-môr-fi), n. [< Gr. μετά, beyond, + μορφή, form.] Same as metamorphosis, 2.

metanauplius (met-a-nâ′pli-us), n.; pl. metanauplii (-i). [NL., < Gr. μετά, after, + NL. nauplius, q. v.] A later stage in the development of some crustaceans, after the first nauplius form, and before the zoëa stage is reached; a crustacean of this later naupliiform character.

metanephros (met-a-nef′ros), n.; pl. metanephroi (-roi). [NL., < Gr. μετά, behind, + νεφρός, kidney: see nephritis.] The most posterior and latest-formed segment of an embryonic renal organ, or section of the Wolffian body from which the permanent kidney is derived, and whose duct becomes a ureter: distinguished from pronephros and mesonephros.

metanotal (met-a-nō′tal), a. [< metanotum + -al.] Situated on or pertaining to the metanotum: as, a metanotal sclerite.

metanotum (met-a-nō′tum), n.; pl. metanota (-tä). [NL., < Gr. μετά, behind, + νῶτον, νῶτος, the back.] The dorsal part of the metathorax of an insect, succeeding the mesonotum and preceding the abdomen; the third and last segment of the notum. It is divided typically into four sclerites, called præscutum, scutum, scutellum, and postscutellum, most of which are usually distinguishable. —Lateral callosities of the metanotum. See lateral.

metaparapteral (met″a-pa-rap′te-ral), a. [< metaparapteron + -al.] Of or pertaining to the metaparapteron.

metaparapteron (met″a-pa-rap′te-ron), n.; pl. metaparaptera (-rä). [NL., < Gr. μετά, with, + NL. parapteron.] In entom., the parapteron of the metathoracic segment; the third sclerite of the metapleuron.

metapepsis (met-a-pep′sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μετά, beyond, + πέψις, a cooking (boiling), < πέπτειν, cook, boil: see peptic.] In lithol., a term suggested by G. H. Kinahan, but not generally adopted, as a synonym for what is generally called regional metamorphism. See metamorphism.

One kind of Metamorphism is Regional, or extends over large areas. The rocks affected by it seem to have been under the influence of intensely heated water or steam, which, as it were, stewed them, from which the action may be called metapepsis.
G. H. Kinahan, Geol. of Ireland, p. 175.

metaph. An abbreviation of metaphysics.

metaphery (me-taf′e-ri), n. [< Gr. μεταφέρειν, carry over, transfer: see metaphor. Cf. periphery.] In bot., the transposition or displacement of various floral organs, as when petals that are normally alternate with the sepals are placed in front of them, as occurs rarely in Fuchsia.

metaphor (met'ạ-for), n. [= F. métaphore = Sp. metáfora = Pg. metaphora = It. metafora, < L. metaphora, < Gr. μεταφορά, a transfer to one word of the sense of another (L. translatio), < μεταφέρειν, carry over, transfer, < μετά, over, + φέρειν, carry, = E. bear[1].] A figure of speech by which, from some supposed resemblance or analogy, a name, an attribute, or an action belonging to or characteristic of one object is assigned to another to which it is not literally applicable; the figurative transfer of a descriptive or affirmative word or phrase from one thing to another; implied comparison by transference of terms: as, the ship spread its wings to the breeze; "Judah is a lion's whelp," Gen. xlix. 9. If Jacob had said, "is like or resembles a lion's whelp," the expression would have been a simile instead of a metaphor. A simple metaphor is contained in a single word or phrase, like those in italics above; a continued metaphor is one in which the figurative description or characterization is maintained throughout a variety of phrases or applications. See simile and trope.

> What els is your Metaphor but an inuersion of sence by transport; your allegorie by a duplicitie of meaning or dissimulation vnder couert and darke intendments?
> Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 128.
> Whatever here seems beauteous, seem'd to be
> But a faint Metaphor of Thee.
> Cowley, The Mistress, Not Fair.
> A metaphor is no argument, though it be sometimes the gunpowder to drive one home and imbed it in the memory. Lowell, Democracy.

Mixed metaphor, a figurative expression in which two or more metaphors are confused, as in the following quotation:

> Where—still to use your lordship's tropes—
> The level of obedience slopes > Upward and downward, as the stream
> Of hydra faction kicks the beam!
> T. Moore, To Lord Castlereagh.

=Syn. Comparison, Allegory, etc. See simile.

metaphoric (met-ạ-for'ik), a. [= F. métaphorique = Sp. metafórico = Pg. metaphorico = It. metaforico, < LL. metaphoricus* (in adv. metaphorice), < Gr. μεταφορικός, relating to metaphor, < μεταφορά, metaphor: see metaphor.] Same as metaphorical.

metaphorical (met-ạ-for'i-kạl), a. [< metaphoric + -al.] Pertaining to or of the nature of metaphor; consisting of or abounding in metaphor; not literal: as, a metaphorical expression; a metaphorical use of words.

> How dangerous it is in sensible things to use metaphorical expressions unto the people, and what absurd conceits they will swallow in their literals.
> Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iv. 10.

metaphorically (met-ạ-for'i-kạl-i), adv. In a metaphorical manner or sense; by way of metaphor; not literally.

metaphoricalness (met-ạ-for'i-kạl-nes), n. The state or quality of being metaphorical.

metaphorist (met'ạ-for-ist), n. [< metaphor + -ist.] One who coins or uses metaphors.

> Let the poet send to the metaphorist for his allegories.

metaphosphate (met-ạ-fos'fāt), n. [< metaphosph(oric) + -ate[1].] A salt formed by the union of metaphosphoric acid with a base.

metaphosphoric (met″ạ-fos-for'ik), a. [< Gr. μετά, with, + E. phosphoric.] Pertaining to, produced from, or resembling a certain acid from phosphorus.

Metaphosphoric acid, HPO_3, an acid obtained by burning phosphorus under a bell-glass filled with air or oxygen, dissolving the fumes in water, evaporating, and heating the residue to redness. The acid is left as a soft, very deliquescent mass. The glacial phosphoric acid of commerce is metaphosphoric acid with soda as an impurity.

metaphragm (met'ạ-fram), n. [< NL. metaphragma, partition, < Gr. μετά, over, + φράγμα, fence, screen: see diaphragm.] In entom., the metapostscutellum, which is visible exteriorly in some insects, but in others is internal, forming a transverse partition at the base of the abdomen.

metaphragma (met-ạ-frag'mạ), n.; pl. metaphragmata (-mạ-tạ̈). [NL.] Same as metaphragm.

metaphrase (met'ạ-frāz), n. [= F. métaphrase = Sp. metáfrasis = Pg. metaphrase, < NL. metaphrasis, < Gr. μετάφρασις, a translation or paraphrase, < μεταφράζειν, change from one style to another, as from poetry to prose, < μετά, over, + φράζειν, speak: see phrase. Cf. paraphrase, periphrase.] 1. A translation; specifically, a verbal translation; a close version or translation from one language into another: opposed to paraphrase.

> His metaphrase of the Psalmes is still in our hands.
> Bp. Hall, To Mr. S. Burton.

2. A responding phrase; a repartee.

> I'm somewhat dull, still, in the manly art
> Of phrase and metaphrase.
> Mrs. Browning, Aurora Leigh, viii.

metaphrase (met'ạ-frāz), v. t.; pret. and pp. metaphrased, ppr. metaphrasing. [< metaphrase, n.] To translate literally; turn into exactly corresponding words: as, to metaphrase Latin poetry.

metaphrasis (me-taf'rạ-sis), n. [NL.: see metaphrase.] Same as metaphrase.

> Metaphrasis is to take some notable place out of a good Poete, and turn the same sens into meter, or into other wordes in Prose. Ascham, The Scholemaster, p. 93.

metaphrast (met'ạ-frast), n. [= F. métaphraste = Sp. metafrasta = Pg. metaphrastes, < Gr. μεταφράστης, one who changes from one style to another, < μεταφράζειν, change from one style to another: see metaphrasis.] A person who translates literally from one language into another.

> George Sandys, Esq., the famous traveller and excellent poetical metaphrast. Wood, Fasti Oxon., p. 1285.

metaphrastic (met-ạ-fras'tik), a. [< metaphrast + -ic.] Close or literal in translation.

> Maximus Planudes, who has the merit of having familiarised to his countrymen many Latin classics of the lower empire, by metaphrastic versions.
> Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, II. 169.

metaphrastical (met-ạ-fras'ti-kạl), a. [< metaphrastic + -al.] Same as metaphrastic.

metaphysic (met-ạ-fiz'ik), a. and n. [= F. métaphysique = Sp. metafísico = Pg. metaphysico = It. metafisico, < ML. metaphysicus, adj., from the earlier noun metaphysica, neut. pl.; as a noun, formerly also metaphysique, < F. métaphysique = Sp. metafísica = Pg. metaphysica = It. metafisica, < LL. metaphysica, neut. pl. (later metaphysicæ, fem. pl.) as a noun, a transfer of the Greek title τῶν μετὰ τὰ φυσικά, A–N, 'the (books) after the Physics, 1–50,' applied first probably by Andronicus of Rhodes, in the 1st century B. C., to certain books of Aristotle, which were not intended to form one treatise, but which all relate to what he called πρωτὴ φιλοσοφία, first philosophy: μετά, after; φυσικά, physics: see physic, physics. The preposition or prefix came to be regarded as meaning 'beyond,' 'above,' and the title metaphysica as the name of a science 'that is above or transcends physics.' Hence mod. formations like metachemistry, metalogic, metamathematics, etc.] I.† a. Same as metaphysical.

metaphysic† (met-ạ-fiz'ik), v. t. [= F. métaphysiquer = Pg. metaphysicar = It. metafisicare, discourse metaphysically; from the noun: see metaphysic, n.] To treat metaphysically. Walpole, Letters (1782), IV. 306.

metaphysical (met-ạ-fiz'i-kạl), a. [< metaphysic + -al.] 1. Of or pertaining to metaphysic or metaphysics; in a loose sense, philosophical; hence, highly abstruse; apart from ordinary or practical modes of thought.

> Hobbes had, in language more precise and luminous than has ever been employed by any other metaphysical writer, maintained that the will of the Prince was the standard of right and wrong. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., ii.

2. Relating to real being, and not merely to appearance; transcendental; hence, pertaining to unverifiable hypotheses.

> Both ideas and words may be said to be true in a metaphysical sense of the word "truth," . . . i. e., really to be such as they exist.
> Locke, Human Understanding, II. xxxii. 2.

3. Pertaining to abstractions, or modes thought of as objects, and named as if they were things; abstract.

> Truth and Falsehood are odd kind of Metaphysical things to them, which they do not care to trouble their heads with. Stillingfleet, Sermons, II. i.

4†. Preternatural or supernatural.

> The golden round,
> Which fate and metaphysical aid doth seem
> To have thee crown'd withal.
> Shak., Macbeth, i. 5. 30.

Metaphysical abstraction. See abstraction.—Metaphysical category, a category of real being; a concept of a form of existence.—Metaphysical cognition. See practical cognition, under cognition.—Metaphysical definition, a definition by genus and difference.—Metaphysical hypothesis, in older writers, a supposition that something really exists, thus comprehending scientific hypotheses generally; by positivist writers used to denote an unverifiable hypothesis, a hypothesis concerning things in themselves as distinguished from phenomena.—Metaphysical method. See method.—Metaphysical mode of expression, the expression of a fact by means of abstract nouns, instead of concrete nouns and adjectives.—Metaphysical partition, the mental separation of anything into parts whose separate existence is impossible.—Metaphysical whole. (a) A species conceived as compounded of its genus and specific difference. (b) A whole of comprehension, or a logical term conceived as compounded of its predicates. (c) A whole of comprehension in a more general sense; a natural whole; any whole in which the subject is viewed as the whole of which the predicates are parts.

metaphysically (met-ạ-fiz'i-kạl-i), adv. 1. From a metaphysical point of view; by metaphysical methods; as regards metaphysics.—2†. Supernaturally.

> The eclipse of the sunne that darkened all the earth at Christes passion, happened altogether prodigiously and metaphysically in plenilunis.
> G. Hervey, Letter to Ed. Spenser (1580).

metaphysician (met″ạ-fi-zish'ạn), n. [= F. métaphysicien; < metaphysic + -ian.] 1. One who is versed in the science of metaphysics.—2. One who practises the mind-cure. [Recent and vulgar.]

metaphysicist (met-ạ-fiz'i-sist), n. [< metaphysic + -ist.] Same as metaphysician.

metaphysics (met-ạ-fiz'iks), n. [Pl. of metaphysic: see -ics.] 1. The science of the inward and essential nature of things. (a) As the subject of the books of Aristotle so called, first philosophy; ontology; the analysis of the nature of being in general; the doctrine of first principles. (b) [The prefix meta- being understood as meaning 'beyond.'] Supernatural science; the doctrine of that which transcends all human experience. (c) The science of the mind treated by means of introspection and analysis, and not by experiment and scientific observation; rational psychology. (d) Any doctrine based upon presumption and not upon inductive reasoning and observation. (e) An abstract and abstruse body of doctrine supposed to be virtually taken for granted in some science: as, "the metaphysics of geometry." [Used frequently with the definite article, and generally connected with unpleasant associations, as being a study very dry and at the same time of doubtful truth.

> The mathematics and the metaphysics,
> Fall to them as you find your stomach serves you.
> Shak., T. of the S., i. 1. 37.
>
> "How," she cried, "you love The metaphysics!"
> Tennyson, Princess, iii.

2. Philosophy in general; especially, the philosophical study of mind; psychology: so used from the time of Descartes, and especially by the Scotch school.

> Metaphysics was a word formerly appropriated to the ontology and pneumatology of the schools, but now understood as equally applicable to all those inquiries which have for their object to trace the various branches of human knowledge to their first principles in the human mind.
> D. Stewart, Dissertations, ii. 475.

3. In the Kantian terminology, the science of God, freedom, and immortality.

Abbreviated metaph.

metaphysiological (met-ạ-fiz″i-ō-loj'i-kạl), a. [< Gr. μετά, beyond, + φυσιολογία, physiology, + -ic-al.] Beyond the province of physiology.

metaphysis (me-taf'i-sis), n. [< Gr. μετά, over, + φύσις, nature: see physic.] Change of nature; transformation; metamorphosis.

metaplasia (met-ạ-plā'si-ạ̈), n. [NL., < Gr. μετάπλασις, transformation: see metaplasis.] The conversion of an adult tissue directly into another form of adult tissue, as of hyaline cartilage into mucous tissue. This takes place principally, if not exclusively, among the tissues of the connective-tissue group.

metaplasis (me-tap'lạ-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μετάπλασις, transformation, < μετά, over, + πλάσις, a molding, conformation, < πλάσσειν, form, mold. Cf. metaplasm[2].] See the quotation.

> This eminent author [Haeckel] regarded the ontogeny of an individual to be divisible into three periods: first, the stages of Anaplasis, or those of progressive evolution; second, the stages of fulfilled growth and development, Metaplasis; third, those of decline, Cataplasis.
> Amer. Nat., XXII. 881.

metaplasm[1] (met'ạ-plazm), n. [< L. metaplasmus, < Gr. μεταπλασμός, a transformation, the assumption of a present or nominative for the derived tenses of verbs or cases of nouns, < μεταπλάσσειν, transform, change, < μετά, over, + πλάσσειν, form, mold.] In gram.: (a) A change or transmutation in a word by adding, transposing, or retrenching a syllable or letter.

> Intercalarius (but it is possible that this latter is simply a metaplasm for intercalaris). Amer. Jour. Philol., X. 39.

(b) Formation of an oblique case or cases from a stem other than that of the nominative.

metaplasm[2] (met′a-plazm), n. [< Gr. μετά, after, + πλάσμα, something molded: see plasm.] In bot., a term applied collectively to the lifeless inclusions (protein-grains, starch, fat, crystals, etc.) in cytoplasm, as opposed to the living substance.

The metaplasm of Hanstein, i. e. that part of the protoplasm which holds the formative material, is colored almost scarlet by Hanstein's aniline violet.
Poulsen, Bot. Micro-Chem. (trans.), p. 82.

metaplast (met′a-plast), n. [< Gr. μετά, over, + πλαστός, verbal adj. of πλάσσειν, form, mold. Cf. metaplasm[1].] In gram., a word or the stem of a word exhibiting metaplasm.

metaplastic (met-a-plas′tik), a. [< metaplast + -ic.] Pertaining to, exhibiting, or characterized by metaplasm.

metaplastology (met″a-plas-tol′ō-ji), n. [< Gr. μετά, over, + πλαστός, verbal adj. of πλάσσειν, form, + Gr. -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The doctrine or science of metaplasis.

Haeckel used also the term Anaplastology for the physiological relations of the stages of progressive growth and those of the Epacme of groups, Metaplastology for those of the adult and the Acme of groups, and Cataplastology for those of the senile stages and the Paracme of groups.
Amer. Nat., XXII. 882.

metapleur (met′a-plör), n. [< Gr. μετά, behind, + πλευρά, the side.] Same as metapleuron.

metapleural (met-a-plö′ral), a. [< metapleura + -al.] 1. In entom., posterior and lateral, as a portion of a metathoracic segment; of or pertaining to the metapleuron.—2. Of or pertaining to the metapleur.

metapleuron (met-a-plö′ron), n.; pl. metapleura (-rä). [NL., < Gr. μετά, with, + πλευρόν, a rib.] 1. A posterior part or extent of the lateral epipleura or epipleural fold of Branchiostoma, behind the preoral epipleura; the atrial epipleura, corresponding in extent to the atrial cavity. Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 184.—2. In entom., the lateral or pleural division of the metathorax; a metathoracic pleuron of an insect.

metapneustic (met-ap-nūs′tik), a. [< Gr. μετά, behind, + πνευστικός, of or for breathing, < πνεῖν, breathe: see pneumatic.] In entom., having a single pair of spiracles or breathing-orifices, situated at the anal end of the body, as certain larvæ.

metapodia, n. Plural of metapodium.

metapodial (met-a-pō′di-al), a. and n. [< NL. metapodialis: see metapodialia.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to the metapodialia.—2. Of or pertaining to the metapodium of a mollusk.

II. n. One of the metapodialia; a metacarpal or metatarsal bone.

metapodialia (met-a-pō-di-ā′li-ä), n. pl. [NL. (Marsh, 1880), neut. pl. of metapodialis, < metapodium, q. v.] The bones of the metacarpus and metatarsus, taken together, and collectively considered as a segment of the fore or hind limb intervening between the mesopodialia and the phalanges. See epipodialia.

metapodium (met-a-pō′di-um), n.; pl. metapodia (-ä). [NL., < Gr. μετά, behind, + πούς (ποδ-) = E. foot.] The posterior one of the three sections into which the foot of some mollusks, as gastropods and pteropods, may be divided: correlated with mesopodium and propodium.

metapolitics (met-a-pol′i-tiks), n. [< Gr. μετά, beyond, + πολιτικά, politics: see politics.] A purely speculative treatment of politics unrelated to practical questions. Coleridge.

Metapontine (met-a-pon′tin), a. and n. [< L. Metapontinus, < Metapontum, < Gr. Μεταπόντιον, a city in Italy (see def.), orig. neut. of μεταπόντιος, in the midst of the sea, < μετά, amid, + πόντος, sea.] I. a. Of or pertaining to Metapontum or Metapontium, an ancient city of Magna Græcia in Italy.

Every Athenian coin displays the owl, . . . every Metapontine the corn-ear, as its chief device.
The Academy, Feb. 25, 1888, p. 139.

II. n. An inhabitant of Metapontum.

metapophysial (met-ap-ō-fiz′i-al), a. [< metapophysis + -al.] Of or pertaining to a metapophysis.

metapophysis (met-a-pof′i-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μετά, after, + ἀπόφυσις, a process: see apophysis.] In anat., a dorsolateral apophysis developed on the prezygapophysis or anterior articular process of a vertebra, especially in the lumbar region. It corresponds to the inner tubercle of the diapophysis of a thoracic vertebra. It is sometimes very highly developed, as in the armadillo, when it assists in the support of the carapace. In man, in whom it is rudimentary yet is endogenous or enveloped from an independent center of ossification, it is found in the lumbar region, as the mammillary process or mammillary tubercle. See cut under lumbar.

metapore (met′a-pōr), n. [< NL. metaporus, < Gr. μετά, behind, + πόρος, passage: see pore[2].] A small blind pore in the median line of the medulla oblongata immediately behind the pons Varolii; the so-called foramen of Magendie.

metapostscutellar (met″a-pōst-skū-tel′är), a. [< metapostscutellum + -ar[3].] Of or pertaining to the metapostscutellum.

metapostscutellum (met-a-pōst-skū-tel′um), n.; pl. metapostscutella (-ä). [NL., < Gr. μετά, behind, + NL. postscutellum, q. v.] The postscutellum of the metanotum; the postscutellar sclerite of the metathorax of an insect.

metapræscutal (met″a-prē-skū′tal), a. [< metapræscutum + -al.] Of or pertaining to the metapræscutum.

metapræscutum (met″a-prē-skū′tum), n.; pl. metapræscuta (-tä). [NL., < Gr. μετά, behind, + NL. præscutum, q. v.] In entom., the præscutum of the metanotum; the præscutal sclerite of the metathorax.

metapsyche (met-ap-sī′kē), n. [NL., < Gr. μετά, behind, + ψυχή, soul: see Psyche.] Haeckel's name for the hind-brain or cerebellar segment of the encephalon; the metencephalon or epencephalon.

metapsychosis (me-tap-si-kō′sis), n.; pl. metapsychoses (-sēz). [NL., < Gr. μεταψύχωσις, a transfer of soul from one body to another, < μετά, over, + ψύχωσις, a giving of life or spirit: see psychosis.] The supposed action of one mind upon another without any known physical means of communication, or its effect. See psychosis and telepathy.

It would be a grave retardation of science were it assumed that this strange metapsychosis was a medical curiosity alone. Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, III. 422.

metapterygial (me-tap-te-rij′i-al), a. [< metapterygium + -al.] Of or pertaining to the metapterygium: as, metapterygial basalia.

metapterygium (me-tap-te-rij′i-um), n.; pl. metapterygia (-ä). [NL. (Huxley, 1871), < Gr. μετά, behind, + NL. pterygium, q. v.] The hindmost of several basal cartilages which the pterygium of a fish, as an elasmobranch, may present. See pterygium.

metapterygoid (met-ap-ter′i-goid), a. and n. [< Gr. μετά, after, + E. pterygoid.] I. a. Coming after or situated behind the true pterygoid.

II. n. A metapterygoid bone.

metaptosis (met-ap-tō′sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μετάπτωσις, a change, < μεταπίπτειν, change, < μετά, over, + πίπτειν, fall, > πτῶσις, a falling.] In logic, the change of a proposition from being false to being true, or the reverse.

metarabin (me-tar′a-bin), n. [< Gr. μετά, beyond, + E. arabin.] The gum of cherry-, plum-, and almond-trees. It is also formed by treating arabin with sulphuric acid. Same as cerasin (which see).

metargon (met-är′gon), n. [Gr. μετά, beyond, + E. argon.] A supposed element found in atmospheric air: afterward found to be merely carbon monoxid.

Metarrhiptæ (met-a-rip′tē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μεταρρίπτειν, turn over, turn about, < μετά, over, + ῥίπτειν, throw.] An order of acephalous or conchiferous mollusks founded upon the family Tridacnidæ. In these gigantic bivalves the body is apparently turned half-way round, whence the name. There is a subcentral adductor muscle, and the foot protrudes in front of the beak or umbo of the shell. Gill.

metarrhiptous (met-a-rip′tus), a. Of or pertaining to the Metarrhiptæ, or having their characters.

metascuta, n. Plural of metascutum.

metascutal (met-a-skū′tal), a. [< metascutum + -al.] Of or pertaining to the metascutum.

metascutellar (met-a-skū′tel-är), a. [< metascutellum + -ar[3].] Of or pertaining to the metascutellum.

metascutellum (met″a-skū-tel′um), n.; pl. metascutella (-ä). [NL., < Gr. μετά, beyond, + NL. scutellum, q. v.] In entom., the scutellum of the metanotum; the scutellar sclerite of the metathorax.

metascutum (met-a-skū′tum), n.; pl. metascuta (-tä). [NL., < Gr. μετά, beyond, + NL. scutum, q. v.] In entom., the scutum or second division of the metanotum. The name is principally used in descriptions of Hymenoptera, Diptera, and Neuroptera, in which the metascutum generally forms an oblique or vertical surface behind the wings and above the insertion of the abdomen.

metasilicate (met-a-sil′i-kāt), n. [< metasilic-ic + -ate[1].] A salt of the hypothetical metasilicic acid H_2SiO_3: often called in mineralogy a bisilicate: as, calcium metasilicate (the mineral wollastonite, $CaSiO_3$ or $CaO.SiO_2$).

metasilicic (met″a-si-lis′ik), a. [< Gr. μετά, with, + E. silicic.] A word used only in the phrase metasilicic acid. See metasilicate.

metasoma (met-a-sō′mä), n.; pl. metasomata (-ma-tä). [NL.: see metasome.] Same as metasome.

metasomatic (met″a-sō-mat′ik), a. [< metasoma (-somat-) + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to the metasome of a cephalopod.—2. Pertaining to or resulting from metasomatism: as, metasomatic rocks.

metasomatism (met-a-sō′ma-tizm), n. [As metasomat(osis) + -ism.] Same as metasomatosis.

metasomatosis (met-a-sō-ma-tō′sis), n. [LL., < Gr. μετά, over, + σῶμα (σώματ-), body.] In geol., a term used by writers on metamorphism and ore-deposits to describe the process whereby one mineral, such as galena, replaces another, such as calcite. It is contrasted with pseudomorphism, in that the latter change preserves the original form while the former does not. The adjective is more common.

Although the crystalline rocks . . . have been supposed to be occasionally the subject of wide-spread metasomatosis, we may properly restrict the title of a general metasomatic hypothesis to that which seeks to explain the derivation of the principal crystalline silicated rocks from limestones.
T. S. Hunt, Min. Physiology and Physiography, p. 105.

metasome (met′a-sōm), n. [< NL. metasoma, < Gr. μετά, after, + σῶμα, body.] The posterior part of the body of a cephalopod, which is enveloped in the mantle and contains the viscera. The name is also given to the posterior part of the body of bivalve mollusks, behind the mesosome and the foot, containing the posterior adductor muscle.

metastannate (met-a-stan′āt), n. [< metastannic + -ate[1].] A salt of metastannic acid.

metastannic (met-a-stan′ik), a. [< Gr. μετά, beyond, + E. stannic.] An epithet applied to the hydroxid or acid produced by digesting tin in nitric acid. It is isomeric with stannic acid, but quite different in its properties.

metastasis (me-tas′ta-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μετάστασις, a removal, change, departure, < μεθιστάναι, put in another place, change, remove, < μετά, over, + ἱστάναι, place: see stasis.] 1. Change of substance; conversion of one substance into another.

He considers what not unfrequently happens in distempered bodies by the metastasis of the morbifick matter.
Boyle, Works, II. 197.

2. In pathol., the production of local disease in some part of the body from a focus of more or less similar disease in some other part not immediately adjacent.—3. In bot., metabolism.

metastatic (met-a-stat′ik), a. [< metastasis (-at-) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to metastasis; characterized by or consisting in metastasis.

Those metastatic changes which take place in the ordinary growth of plants or the storing of reserve material.
Bessey, Botany, p. 186.

metastatically (met-a-stat′i-kal-i), adv. By metastasis.

metasternal (met-a-stėr′nal), a. [< metasternum + -al.] In entom., metathoracic and sternal or ventral, as a sclerite of an insect's thorax; of or pertaining to the metasternum.—Metasternal epimera and episterna, the side pieces of the metathorax, adjoining the sternum.—Metasternal pores, minute openings at the sides of the metasternum, found in certain beetles of the family Cerambycidæ. They exhale a musky odor produced by scent-organs within the body. Also called scent-pores.

metasternum (met-a-stėr′num), n.; pl. metasterna (-nä). [NL., < Gr. μετά, behind, + στέρνον, breast, > NL. sternum, q. v.] 1. In anat., the hindmost segment or last sterneber of the breast-bone; the xiphisternum, in man represented by the xiphoid cartilage or ensiform appendage.—2. In entom., the sternite of the metathorax; the median part of the postpectus.

metasthenic (met-a-sthen′ik), a. [< Gr. μετά, behind, + σθένος, strength, might.] Strong in the hinder parts; having the strength or weight of organization behind the middle of the body, as a kangaroo.

metastibnite (met-a-stib′nīt), n. [< Gr. μετά, along with, + E. stibnite.] Antimony trisulphid, occurring as an amorphous reddish coating upon silicious sinter at the Steamboat Springs, Washoe county, Nevada.

metastoma (me-tas′tō-mä), n.; pl. metastomata (met-a-stō′ma-tä). [NL., < Gr. μετά, behind, + στόμα, mouth.] In Crustacea, a median development, often bifid, of the ventral part of a somite immediately behind the mouth. It is the so-called labium or under lip, composed of small pieces immediately below or behind the mouth. Also called hypostoma. See the quotation, and cut under cephalothorax.

On each side of, and behind, the mouth [of the crawfish] are two little elongated oval calcified plates, between which an oval process, setose at its extremity, proceeds downward and forward, and lies in close apposition with the posterior face of the mandible of its side. This is one-half of what is termed by most authors the labium; but, to avoid confusion with the labium of Insecta, from which it is wholly different, it may be called the metastoma.
Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 272.

★metatarsal (met-ạ-tär′sạl), a. and n. [< metatarsus + -al.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the metatarsus, or to one of the bones that form it.

II. n. One of the bones of the metatarsus. They are not more than five in number, reckoned as first, etc., from the inner to the outer side of the foot. When there are fewer than five, it is always the lateral metatarsals which have disappeared, so that an animal with three metatarsals has lost the first and fifth; in one with a single metatarsal the third or middle one remains. Metatarsals may ankylose together, as two do in the metatarsus of the ox, and three in that of any recent bird: in the latter case the compound bone is further complicated by fusion with it of tarsal elements, constituting a tarsometatarsus (which see). See cut at metatarsus.—Accessory metatarsal, in ornith. See metatarsus, 1.

metatarsale (met″ạ-tär-sā′lē), n.; pl. metatarsalia (-li-ạ). [NL.: see metatarsal.] A bone of the metatarsus; one of the metatarsals.

metatarsalgia (met″ạ-tär-sal′ji-ạ), n. [NL., < metatarsus + Gr. ἄλγος, pain.] In pathol., pain in the metatarsus. Lancet, No. 3423, p. 707.

metatarse (met′ạ-tärs), n. [< NL. metatarsus, q. v.] The metatarsus.

metatarsi, n. Plural of metatarsus.

metatarsodigital (met-ạ-tär-sō-dij′i-tạl), a. [< NL. metatarsus + L. digitus, finger, + -al.] Same as metatarsophalangeal.

metatarsophalangeal (met-ạ-tär″sō-fā-lan′jē-ạl), a. [< NL. metatarsus + phalanges + -al.] Of or pertaining to the metatarsus and to the phalanges: as, a metatarsophalangeal articulation or ligament.

metatarsus (met-ạ-tär′sus), n.; pl. metatarsi (-sī). [NL., < Gr. μετά, beyond, + ταρσός, in mod. sense 'tarsus': see tarsus.] 1. The middle segment of the three of which the foot, or third division of the hind limb, consists, considered with special reference to its bony structure. It is the part of the foot between the tarsus and the toes, in man corresponding closely with the instep, and composed of five bones. (See cut under foot.) In a horse it is the part of the hind leg between the hock and the fetlock, and has but one functional bone. In birds it is the part popularly called the shank, and in descriptive ornithology known as the tarsus. In most birds the metatarsus is naked and scaly, and extends from the bases of the toes to the suffrago or first joint above. It usually consists of a single stout bone, representing three metatarsals fused together, and further complicated by the fusion of distal tarsal elements with its proximal end. In birds with four toes the metatarsus includes a small separate bone known as the accessory metatarsal, which is the metatarsal bone of the hallux or hind toe, the metatarsus hallucis.

a, articular facet for inner condyle of tibia; b, articular facet for outer condyle of tibia; c, c, two foramina, showing incomplete fusion of three metatarsals; d, point of attachment of accessory metatarsal; 2, 3, 4, articular facets for second, third, and fourth toes.

2. In entom.: (a) The first one of the joints of the tarsus, when it is large or otherwise distinguished from the rest, which are then called collectively the dactylus. Also called planta, in which case the other joints are collectively known as the digitus. The peculiarly expanded and bristly metatarsus or planta of bees is known as the scopula. (b) With some authors, the hind foot; the entire tarsus of each hind leg; each of the third pair of tarsi. When this nomenclature is used, the tarsus of the middle leg is called mesotarsus and that of the fore leg protarsus. (c) The sixth joint of a spider's leg, being the first of the two which form the foot.—Flexor metatarsi. Same as peroneus tertius (which see, under peroneus).

metatartaric (met″ạ-tär-tar′ik), a. [< Gr. μετά, with, + E. tartaric.] A word used only in the following phrase:—Metatartaric acid, an amorphous form of ordinary tartaric acid, prepared by keeping it for some time at its melting temperature.

metatatic (met-ạ-tat′ik), a. [< Gr. μετά, with, + τάσις (τατι-), tension, intensity, force, < τατός, verbal adj. of τείνειν, stretch: see tend.] Relating to a coincidence of directions of stress and strain.—Metatatic isotrophy, plane, etc. See the nouns.—Orthogonal or principal metatatic axes. See axis[1].

metatatically (met-ạ-tat′i-kạl-i), adv. In a metatatic manner or sense.

metatela (met-ạ-tē′lä), n.; pl. metatelæ (-lē). [NL., < Gr. μετά, behind, + NL. tela, q. v.] The tela of the metencephalon; the inferior choroid tela; in man, a very delicate tissue of the brain, more commonly called velum medullare posterius. See tela, velum. Wilder and Gage.

Metatheria (met-ạ-thē′ri-ạ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μετά, between, + θηρίον, a wild beast.] A subclass of Mammalia including the existing Marsupialia and their extinct ancestors, as well as other mammals intermediate between marsupials and placental mammals. The marsupials are the only known examples, the term being thus equivalent to Didelphia. It is correlated with Prototheria and Eutheria.

metatherian (met-ạ-thē′ri-ạn), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the Metatheria, or having their characters: as, a metatherian mammal; the metatherian type.

II. n. A member of the Metatheria.

metathesis (me-tath′e-sis), n. [LL., < Gr. μετάθεσις, transposition, metathesis, < μετατίθεναι, put over, transpose, < μετά, over, + τιθέναι, put: see thesis.] 1. In gram., transposition, more especially of the letters, sounds, or syllables of a word, as in the case of Anglo-Saxon ācsian, āscian, English ax, ask; Anglo-Saxon brid, English bird.

The transposition of vowels and liquids—metathesis—is an ordinary and familiar phenomenon of language.
J. Hadley, Essays, p. 159.

2. In surg., a change in place of a morbid substance; an operation removing a morbific agent from one part to another, as in couching for cataract.—3. In logic, same as conversion.

metathetic (met-ạ-thet′ik), a. [< metathesis (-thet-) + -ic.] Of the nature of or containing metathesis.

★metathetical (met-ạ-thet′i-kạl), a. [< metathetic + -al.] Same as metathetic.

metathoracic (met″ạ-thō-ras′ik), a. [< metathorax + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the metathorax of an insect.—Metathoracic case, the metathoracotheca.—Metathoracic legs, the third pair of legs of any hexapod; the hind legs.—Metathoracic wings, the posterior or lower wings.

metathoracotheca (met-ạ-thō″ra-kō-thē′kạ), n.; pl. metathoracothecæ (-sē). [NL., < metathorax + θήκη, a case.] In entom. the metathoracic case, or that part of the integument of a pupa covering the metathorax. It is generally indistinguishable in the Lepidoptera and Diptera.

Metathorax, shaded, between mesothorax (a) and abdomen (b); c, prothorax; d, head.

metathorax (met-ạ-thō′raks), n. [NL., < Gr. μετά, beyond, + θώραξ, the chest.] In entom., the third and last segment of the thorax, succeeding the mesothorax, preceding the abdomen, and bearing the third pair of legs and the second pair of wings.—Declivity of the metathorax. See declivity.

metatome (met′ạ-tōm), n. [< Gr. μετά, among, between, + τομή, a cutting, < τέμνειν, ταμεῖν, cut.] In arch., the space between two dentils. Gwilt.

metaxin (me-tak′sin), n. [< LGr. μέταξα, silk, + -in[2].] A distinct proteid substance entering into the composition of the fibrillar structure of chloroplastids.

metaxite (me-tak′sīt), n. [< LGr. μέταξα, silk, + -ite[2].] In mineral., a variety of serpentine occurring in fibrous or columnar forms with a silky luster.

metayage (me-tā′yāj; F. pron. mā-tā-yäzh′), n. [< F. métayage; as metay(er) + -age.] The cultivation of land on shares; the metayer system of agriculture.

Metayage—that is to say, a kind of temporary partnership or joint venture, in which the proprietor supplies the land and the seed, and the peasants do all the work with their own horses and implements.
D. M. Wallace, Russia, p. 519.

metayer (me-tā′yėr; F. pron. mā-tā-yā′), n. [< F. métayer, < ML. medietarius, one who tills land for half the produce, < L. medieta(-i-)s, middle place, half: see moiety, mediety.] A cultivator who tills a farm or piece of ground for the owner, on condition of receiving a share of the produce, generally a half, the owner generally furnishing the whole or a part of the stock, tools, etc. This system of cultivation, called metayage or the metayer system, prevails in the central and southern parts of France and in most of Italy, and is practised to a considerable extent in the southern United States.

The principle of the metayer system is that the labourer or peasant makes his engagement directly with the landowner, and pays, not a fixed rent, either in money or in kind, but a certain proportion of the produce, or rather of what remains of the produce after deducting what is considered necessary to keep up the stock. The proportion is usually, as the name imports, one-half; but in several districts in Italy it is two-thirds. Respecting the supply of stock, the custom varies from place to place; in some places the landlord furnishes the whole, in others half, in others some particular part, as for instance the cattle and seed, the labourer providing the implements.
J. S. Mill, Pol. Econ., II. viii. § 1.

The metayer has less motive to exertion than the peasant proprietor, since only half the fruits of his industry, instead of the whole, are his own.
J. S. Mill, Pol. Econ., II. viii. § 2.

metaynt, n. A Middle English form of mitten.

Metazoa (met-ạ-zō′ạ), n. pl. [NL., pl. of metazoön, q. v.] All those animals which are above the Protozoa, and which in the course of their development undergo certain metamorphoses, consisting of the primary segmentation of a true egg or ovum, and the subsequent passage through an embryonic condition in which they possess at least two distinct germinal layers; animals exhibiting cellular differentiation. The Metazoa are distinguished from the Protozoa in that the substance of the body is differentiated into histogenic elements—that is to say, into cells. In all the Metazoa the ovum has the form of a nucleated cell, the first step in the process of development being the production of a blastoderm by the subdivision of that cell, the cells of the blastoderm giving rise in turn to two layers of cells, endoderm and ectoderm, between which, in most cases, a mesoderm appears, to be itself split in two layers; such a four-layered germ developing finally all the histological elements of the adult body. With the exception of certain parasites, and the extremely modified males of a few species, all these animals possess a permanent alimentary cavity lined by a special layer of endodermal cells. Sexual reproduction is the rule, and very generally the male element has the form of filiform spermatozoa. The lowest term in the series of the Metazoa is represented by the Porifera or sponges. Those of the Metazoa which possess a notochord, and in the adult state have the trunk divided into segments or myotomes, constitute the subkingdom Vertebrata; the rest are the several subkingdoms of invertebrates. Compare Protozoa. See Mesozoa, and cuts under gastrulation.

metazoan (met-ạ-zō′ạn), a. and n. [< Metazoa + -an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Metazoa.

The Metazoan segmentation of the ovum.
Encyc. Brit., XX. 419.

II. n. A member of the Metazoa; a metazoön.

metazoic (met-ạ-zō′ik), a. [< Metazoa + -ic.] Pertaining to the Metazoa, or having their characters.

metazoön (met-ạ-zō′on), n. [NL., < Gr. μετά, after, + ζῷον, an animal.] One of the Metazoa; any animal which has a gastrula stage, or which undergoes in the course of its development a process of delamination or of gastrulation, whether by emboly or by epiboly; an animal consisting of several cells as opposed to a protozoan or unicellular animal. Compare ★metaphyte.

mete[1] (mēt), v.; pret. and pp. meted, ppr. meting. [< ME. meten, < AS. metan (pret. mæt, pl. mæ-ton, pp. meten), measure, = OS. metan = OFries. meta = D. meten = MLG. First forthi shewe we hegh mesure, that es to say howe any thynge that has heght may be met howe hegh it es, and this may be done in many maneres.
MS. Sloane, 213. (Halliwell.)

She [the Soul] counts their Stars, she metes their distances And differing pases.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 6.

A fair dial to mete out the day.
B. Jonson, Sad Shepherd, i. 2.

2. To distribute or apportion by measure; measure or deal (out); dole.

I will divide Shechem, and mete out the valley of Succoth. Ps. lx. 6.

For with the same measure that ye mete withal it shall be measured to you again. Luke vi. 38.

I mete and dole
Unequal laws unto a savage race.
Tennyson, Ulysses.

3. To be a measure of; serve for determining or expressing the extent, quantity, or capacity of.

What word metes absolute loss?
Mrs. Browning, Drama of Exile.

II.† intrans. To take measure or line; aim.

Let the mark have a prick in 't to mete at.

In Providence. Whittier, Anniversary Poem.

mete[2]†, v. [ME. meten (pret. mette), < AS. mētan, dream.] I. intrans. 1. To dream: often used impersonally: as, me mette, I dreamed.

And in a launde as ich lay, lenede ich and slepte,
And merueylously me mette. Piers Plowman (C), i. 9.

This nyght thrye—
To goode mote it torne!—of yow I mette.
Chaucer, Troilus, ii. 90.

Hence—2. To lose the use of one's senses; be out of one's mind.

I swor hir this . . .
Never to false yow, but [unless] I mete.
Chaucer, Death of Blanche, l. 1234.

II. trans. To dream.

Piers Plowman (A), viii. 145.

metelesst, a. A Middle English form of meatless.

metely†, a. See meetly.

metembryo (me-tem′bri-ō), n. [< Gr. μετά, ★after, + ἔμβρυον, embryo: see embryo.] The gastrula stage of the metazoan embryo, parallel with the adult of some sponges, as ascons. Hyatt, Proc. Bost. Soc. Nat. Hist., 1887. See cut under gastrula.

metembryonic (me-tem-bri-on′ik), a. [< metembryo(n) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a metembryo.

metempiric (met-em-pir′ik), n. [< Gr. μετά, beyond, + ἐμπειρία, experience: see empiric.] One who believes in the metempirical or transcendental philosophy. Also metempiricist.

metempirical (met-em-pir′i-kal), a. [< metempiric + -al.] In metaph., beyond or outside of experience; not based on experience; transcendental; a priori: opposed to empirical or experiential.

The metempirical region is the void where Speculation roams unchecked, where Sense has no footing, where Experiment can exercise no control, and where Calculation ends in impossible Quantities.
G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, I. i. § 15.

metempiricism (met-em-pir′i-sizm), n. [< metempiric + -ism.] In metaph., a system of philosophy based on a priori reasoning; transcendentalism.

metempiricist (met-em-pir′i-sist), n. [< metempiric + -ist.] Same as metempiric.

metempsychose (me-temp′si-kōz), v. t.; pret. and pp. metempsychosed, ppr. metempsychosing. [< metempsychosis.] To transfer from one body to another, as the soul; cause to undergo metempsychosis.

The souls of usurers after their death Lucian affirms to be metempsychosed, or translated into the bodies of asses, and there remain certain years for poor men to take their pennyworth out of their bones. Peacham, Blazoning.

metempsychosis (me-temp-si-kō′sis), n. [< LL. metempsychosis (rare), < Gr. μετεμψύχωσις, the transference of the soul from one body into another, < μετεμψυχοῦν, make the soul pass from one body into another, < μετά, over, + ἐμψυχοῦν, put a soul into, animate, ἔμψυχος, having life, < ἐν, in, + ψυχή, soul, life: see Psyche, and cf. psychosis, metapsychosis.] Transmigration of the soul; the passing of the soul of a person after death into another body, either that of a human being or that of an animal: a doctrine held by various ancient peoples and by Pythagoras and his followers, and still maintained by Brahmans and some others: also loosely used of such a transfer of the soul of a living person.

I cannot believe the wisdom of Pythagoras did ever positively, and in a literal sense, affirm his metempsychosis, or impossible transmigration of the souls of men into beasts. Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, i. 37.

The Mollah and the Christian dog Change place in mad metempsychosis.
Whittier, The Haschish.

metempsychosize (me-temp-si-kō′sīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. metempsychosized, ppr. metempsychosizing. [< metempsychosis + -ize.] To cause to pass after death into the body of some other living thing: said of the soul.

Izaak Walton . . . metempsychosized into a frog.
Southey, Doctor, ccxii. (Davies.)

metemptosis (met-emp-tō′sis), n. [< Gr. μετά, beyond, + ἔμπτωσις, a falling upon, < ἐμπίπτειν, fall upon or in, < ἐν, in, + πίπτειν, fall.] In chron., the solar equation which would be necessary to prevent the calendar new moon from happening a day too late, or the suppression of the bissextile once in 134 years. The opposite to this is the proemptosis, or the addition of a day every 300 years and another every 2,400 years.

metencephalic (met-en-se-fal′ik or -sef′a-lik), a. [< metencephalon + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the metencephalon, in either sense.

metencephalon (met-en-sef′a-lon), n.; pl. metencephala (-lä). [NL., < Gr. μετά, after, + ἐγκέφαλος, the brain: see encephalon.] 1. The afterbrain; the medulla oblongata as far as the pons Varolii: synonymous with myelencephalon of Huxley and others, and macromyelon of Owen. Quain; Wilder and Gage.—2. The cerebellar segment of the brain, the chief parts of which are the cerebellum and pons Varolii. Huxley. See cuts under brain and encephalon.

metensomatosis (met-en-sō-ma-tō′sis), n. [LL., < LGr. μετενσωμάτωσις, a putting into another body, < μετενσωματοῦν, put into another body, < Gr. μετά, over, + ἐνσωματοῦν, put into a body, embody, < ἐνσώματος, in the body, < ἐν, in, + σῶμα, body.] The transference of the elements of one body into another body and their conversion into its substance, as by decomposition and assimilation.

Is it not indisputable that man's body . . . is composed of the very same materials, the same protein, and fats, and salines, and water, which constitute the inorganic world—which may unquestionably have served long ago as the dead material which was vivified and utilized in the bodies of extinct creatures, and which may serve in endless metensomatosis (if the word, which has the authority of Clemens Alexandrinus, and which is now imperiously demanded by the wants of science, may be pardoned on the score of necessity) for we know not what organisms yet to come? Farrar.

metenteronic (met-en-te-ron′ik), a. [< metenteron + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the metenteron.

meteogram (mē′tē-ō-gram), n. [Short for meteorogram*, < Gr. μετέωρον, a meteor (see meteor), + γράμμα, a writing: see gram[2].] A diagram composed of the tracings made by several self-recording meteorological instruments, as the thermograph and the barograph.

meteograph (mē′tē-ō-graf), n. [Short for meteorograph.] Same as meteorograph.

The meteograph, with the anemograph.
R. Abercromby, Nature, XXXVI. 319.

meteor (mē′tē-ôr), n. [< OF. meteore, F. météore = Sp. Pg. meteoro = It. meteora, < NL. meteorum, < Gr. μετέωρον, a meteor (def. 1), usually in pl. μετέωρα, lit. 'things in the air,' neut. of μετέωρος, lifted up, on high, in air, < μετά, beyond, + ἀείρειν, lift up, raise (> ἐώρα, another form of αἰώρα, a being lifted up or suspended on high, hovering, anything suspended).] 1. Any atmospheric phenomenon.

Hail, an ordinary meteor; murrain of cattle an ordinary disease, yet for a plague to obdured Pharaoh miraculously wrought. Bp. Hall, Invisible World, i. § 6.

Except they be watered from higher regions, and fructifying meteors of knowledge, these weeds must so lose their alimental sappe, and wither of themselves.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., Pref.

In starry flake, and pellicle,
All day the hoary meteor fell.
Whittier, Snow-Bound.

Specifically—2. A transient fiery or luminous body seen in or through the atmosphere, usually in its more elevated region; a shooting-star. If it reaches the surface of the earth, it is called a meteorite, formerly aërolite, and also (very rarely) uranolite.

And all their silver crescents then I saw Like falling meteors spent, and set for ever Under the cross of Malta.
Beau. and Fl., Knight of Malta, ii. 1.

The imperial ensign; which, full high advanced,
Shone like a meteor, streaming to the wind.
Milton, P. L., i. 537.

3. A small body moving in space, and of the same nature as those which become visible by encountering our atmosphere. There is reason to suppose that such bodies are very numerous, and that a large proportion of them are concentrated in swarms: it is considered very probable that a comet is only such a meteoric swarm.

meteor. An abbreviation of meteorology, meteorological.

meteor-cloud (mē′tē-ôr-kloud), n. 1. A flock of small meteoroids moving in space. Also called meteoric swarm.—2. A cloud-like train left by a meteor in the upper air. [Rare.]

meteor-dust (mē′tē-ôr-dust), n. Matter in infinitesimal particles supposed to be floating throughout free space, and gradually settling upon the surfaces of the heavenly bodies.

Sir W. Thomson . . . shows that meteor-dust, accumulating at the rate of one foot in 4,000 years, would account for the remainder of retardation.
Huxley, Lay Sermons, p. 248.

meteoric (mē-tē-or′ik), a. [= F. météorique = Sp. meteórico = Pg. It. meteorico, < NL. meteoricus, pertaining to meteors, ML. in the air, on high, < NL. meteorum, a meteor: see meteor.] 1. Of the upper air; empyreal (obsolete); in meteorol., pertaining to atmospheric phenomena in general.

The fiery particles ascended to the most meteoric or highest regions. Sharon Turner, Hist. of World, p. 23.

2. Pertaining to or of the nature of a meteor; consisting of meteors.

Our nature is meteoric, we respect (because we partake so) both earth and heaven. Donne, Letters, xxxvii.

3. Flashing like a meteor; transiently or irregularly brilliant.

Anthony Ashley Cooper, third earl of Shaftesbury (grandson of the first earl, the famous meteoric politician of the reign of Charles II.), was born in 1671 and died in 1713.
Craik, Hist. Eng. Lit., II. 235.

Meteoric astronomy, that branch of science which treats of meteors and meteoroids in their astronomical relations.—Meteoric iron. See iron and meteorite.—Meteoric ring, a swarm of meteoroids more or less thickly scattered along the entire orbit in which they circulate about the sun or other central body, so as to form a ring around it. The rings of Saturn are probably thus constituted.—Meteoric showers, showers of meteors or shooting-stars occurring periodically, and especially in the months of August and November. The maximum brilliancy occurs every thirty-three years, and then sometimes for four years in succession there are showers of unusual magnitude. They are now known to be connected with comets.—Meteoric stones, aërolites. See meteorite.—

Meteoric swarm. Same as meteor-cloud.—Meteoric waters, waters which accrue from condensation of the vapors suspended in the atmosphere. Thomas, Med. Dict.

meteorical (mē-tē-or'i-kal), a. [< meteoric + -al.] Same as meteoric. [Rare.]

I see a resemblance of that meteorical light which appears in moorish places, that seems fire, but is nothing but a flimsy glittering exhalation. Bp. Hall, Soliloquies, xii.

Meteorinæ (mē″tē-ō-rī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Meteorus + -inæ.] A subfamily of Braconidæ or adscite ichneumon-flies, typified by the genus Meteorus, mainly parasitic on lepidopterous insects, having the abdomen petiolate and the fore wings with three submarginal cells.

meteorism (mē'tē-ō-rizm), n. [= F. météorisme = Sp. Pg. It. meteorismo, < NL. meteorismus, < Gr. μετεωρισμός, a being raised up, swelling, < μετεωρίζειν, raise up, < μετέωρος, raised up: see meteor.] In pathol., flatulent distention of the ★abdomen; tympanites.

meteorite (mē'tē-ō-rīt), n. [< meteor + *-ite*².] A mineral or metallic mass of extraterrestrial origin, or which, to use the common expression, has "fallen from the heavens." Bodies of this kind were formerly often called aërolites, but meteorite is now their generally accepted name among scientific men. The fall of meteorites upon the earth is a by no means infrequent occurrence, and records of such events date back to many centuries before the present era. Traditions point to the very early use of meteoric iron for the manufacture of weapons; and it is also known that meteorites were not unfrequently the objects of worship in various parts of the world. In spite of this, the fall of rocks or metals from the heavens seemed to be so improbable an event that full credence was not given by scientific men to stories of such occurrences until about the beginning of the present century, when, several falls having taken place (at Barbotan, France, 1790; Siena, 1794; Wold Cottage, Yorkshire, Eng., 1795; Salés, France, 1798; Benares, 1798; L'Aigle, France, 1803), the details of some of which were thoroughly investigated, a further denial of their genuineness became impossible. From the time of the fall at L'Aigle all doubt in the matter was abandoned. There are now several collections of meteorites, each of which contains specimens of between 300 and 400 different falls, and the whole number known is not far from 400, although it is by no means the case with all these occurrences that the specimens were seen to fall; many of them have been found on the earth's surface, but have been recognized as being extraterrestrial by their peculiar appearance and composition. The most important facts with regard to meteorites may be concisely stated as follows: They have not been found to contain any element not known to occur on the earth; they have furnished no evidence of the existence of life on the body or bodies of which they originally formed a part; they bear no indications of having been formed in the presence of water, or of the existence of water beyond the earth's atmosphere in the regions from which they came; they do exhibit abundant evidence of having had what geologists would call an "igneous origin"; they are never granitic in character, but resemble very closely certain volcanic rocks of not infrequent occurrence, with this difference, that in the case of the meteorites the iron associated with the silicated combinations exists in the metallic form, while in the terrestrial volcanic rocks it is, with rare exceptions, oxidized. Furthermore, meteorites, almost without exception, show a certain family resemblance; so that it is necessary to admit, either that they all originally formed a part of one celestial body, or else that, having come from various members of the solar system, or from other systems, these have a wonderful resemblance to each other and to the earth itself. The most obvious division of meteorites is into metallic and stony, but the passage from one class to the other is by no means an abrupt one. All metallic meteorites agree in that the predominating metal is iron, with which nickel is almost invariably associated; indeed, it has not been proved that there is any meteoric iron entirely free from that metal. With the nickel cobalt is almost always found, as is the case in terrestrial combinations. Tin and copper are also frequently found in meteorites in small quantity. The precious metals have not been detected in them. Meteorites composed almost entirely of metallic (nickeliferous) iron, forming a nearly homogeneous mass, have been denominated siderolites. These, however, almost always contain irregular nodular masses of pyrrhotite, schreibersite (phosphuret of iron and nickel), either one or both, and occasionally of graphite. In a large proportion of the meteoric irons, etching the polished surface with an acid develops the so-called "Widmannstättian figures." The development of these figures on the polished surface of a mass of iron found upon the earth's surface, and in regard to the time of whose fall nothing was known, was formerly considered to be sufficient evidence of the celestial origin of such a mass, especially if, in addition, the presence of nickel could be shown by chemical analysis. While most of the metallic masses thus referred have almost certainly been correctly classed among the meteorites, there may be cases in which such reference has not been justifiable, since it is now known that all celestial irons do not give the Widmannstättian figures, while the iron found in large quantity and over a wide area, associated with and embedded in basalt, near Ovifak in Greenland, contains nickel, and gives, when etched, figures which have generally been considered as Widmannstättian, although others have denied that they could properly be so denominated. The terrestrial origin of the Ovifak iron is, however, now generally admitted, although for a considerable time after its discovery this was not the case. The wide extent of the area over which this iron occurs, and its peculiarly intimate association with the minerals of which the basalt is made up, forbid the idea that the metal could have fallen from above into lava in process of eruption, which was at first the favorite theory of its origin. Next in order to the siderolites come the pallasites, so named from the fact that a large meteorite of this class was in 1772 discovered in Siberia by the distinguished traveler Pallas. Under the name of pallasite are comprehended those meteorites which consist of a spongy or vesicular mass of iron, the cavities of which are in most cases partly or entirely filled with olivin, with which various other minerals are frequently associated, enstatite and bronzite being the most common, while chromite is of not infrequent occurrence. Both siderolites and pallasites belong to the class of metallic meteorites. By far the larger part of the stony meteorites are included under the designation of chondrites. In these the iron is distributed in fine particles through a more or less intimate mixture of silicates, with which chromite and magnetic pyrites are frequently associated, the silicates being chiefly olivin and bronzite. The name chondrite has reference to the fact that in this class of meteorites the material of which they are composed occurs in the form of rounded grains (chondri). The chondritic meteorites have, however, a quite varied structure, in some few cases passing into a breccia; they have been divided into numerous subgroups in accordance with these structural variations. Most of the stony meteorites contain iron disseminated through their mass in grains or nodules; but there are a few which are destitute of such metallic particles. There are also a few stony meteorites which do not exhibit any traces of a chondritic structure: the minerals of which these are made up do not, however, differ very essentially from those occurring in the chondrites. There are also a few very anomalous meteorites which contain carbonaceous matter associated with the stony chondritic material. This carbon is not graphitic, but is combined with hydrogen and oxygen, the product resembling to a certain extent that resulting from the decay of organic matter, but no traces of vegetable tissue have been discovered in these carbonaceous meteorites, which are only five or six in number. One or two interesting facts remain to be mentioned. The first is that since the phenomena of meteorites began to be observed and studied there have been extremely few falls of metallic meteorites. Of all the meteoric irons in the various collections, those of Hraschina in Austria (1751), of Dickson county, Tennessee (1855), of Braunau in Bohemia (1847), and a few others (in all probably about nine), are the only ones positively known to have fallen; all the others are considered meteoric on account of their peculiar appearance and chemical composition. The observed falls of stony meteorites, on the other hand, are numerous. Another remarkable fact is that all the meteorites which are known to have fallen are of infinitesimally small size as compared with the earth. In the fall of L'Aigle some 2,000 to 3,000 stones were estimated to have reached the earth, and of these the largest weighed only seven or eight pounds. The largest meteorites of which the fall was observed are that of Ensisheim (1492), which weighed about 280 pounds, that of Juvinas (1821), 242 pounds, and that of Emmett county, Iowa (1879), when a considerable number of stones fell, the largest of them weighing 437 pounds. Some masses of iron believed to be meteorites, the date of whose fall is unknown, are much larger than this, but still utterly insignificant in size, not only as compared with the earth or its satellite, but even with the smallest celestial body of which anything is definitely known, namely the outer satellite of Mars, which has been estimated at from five to twenty miles in diameter. The mass of iron on the river Bendegó in Brazil has been variously estimated at from seven to ten tons in weight; that of Tucuman (Campo del Cielo) is said to weigh fifteen tons. The Ahnighito meteorite brought by Lieutenant Peary from Cape York, Greenland, in 1897 weighs 36¼ tons.—Neumann's lines, structural lines described by J. G. Neumann as occurring in the Braunau meteorite.

Meteoric Iron.

Meteoric Stone.

meteoritic (mē″tē-ō-rit'ik), a. [< meteorite + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a meteorite or to meteorites.

The bright lines from the interspaces, now at their minimum and containing vapours at a very high temperature—teste the line-absorption spectrum now beginning to replace the flutings—balance the absorption of the meteoritic nuclei. Nature, XXXVIII. 79.

meteorize† (mē'tē-ō-rīz), v. [< meteor + -ize.] To take the form of a meteor; ascend in vapors.

To the end the dews may meteorize and emit their finer spirits. Evelyn, Pomona, i.

★meteorograph (mē'tē-ō-rō-gráf), n. [= F. météorographe = Sp. meteorógrafo, < Gr. μετέωρον, a meteor, + γράφειν, write.] An instrument that combines the registering apparatus of a barograph, thermograph, anemograph, etc., in such a manner as to obtain on the same sheet a continuous record of the variations of the several meteorological elements.

meteorographic (mē″tē-ō-rō-graf'ik), a. [= F. météorographique = Sp. meteorográfico; as meteorograph-y + -ic.] Pertaining to meteorography.

meteorography (mē″tē-ō-rog'ra-fi), n. [= F. météorographie = Pg. meteorographia, < Gr. μετέωρον, a meteor, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] Meteorology; specifically, the registration of meteorological phenomena.

meteoroid (mē'tē-ō-roid), n. [< Gr. μετέωρον, a meteor, + εἶδος, form.] A body traveling in space, and of the same nature as those which on entering the earth's atmosphere become visi-★ble as meteors.

meteoroidal (mē″tē-ō-roi'dal), a. [< meteoroid + -al.] Pertaining to meteoroids or meteors.

This remarkable group of planetoidal or meteoroidal bodies forms a tolerably wide zone or ring between the orbits of Mars and Jupiter. Smithsonian Report, 1881, p. 29.

meteorolite (mē'tē-ō-rō-līt), n. [= F. météorolithe = Pg. meteorolithe, < Gr. μετέωρον, a meteor, + λίθος, a stone.] Same as meteorite.

meteorologic (mē″tē-ō-rō-loj'ik), a. [= F. météorologique = Sp. meteorológico = Pg. It. meteorologico, < NL. meteorologicus, < Gr. μετεωρολογικός, pertaining to meteorology, < μετεωρολογία, meteorology: see meteorology.] Same as meteorological.

Every extensive region [has] its own meteorologic conditions. H. Spencer, Universal Progress, p. 7.

meteorological (mē″tē-ō-rō-loj'i-kal), a. [< meteorologic + -al.] Of or pertaining to weather; atmospheric; specifically, of or pertaining to the science of meteorology.—Meteorological curve, a line or diagram which presents graphically the successive actual or mean values of any meteorological element.—Meteorological elements, the fundamental data of meteorological observations: namely, the temperature, pressure, humidity, and electrical potential of the air; the rate of evaporation; the amount and kind of precipitation; the direction and velocity of the wind; the kind, direction of motion, and velocity of clouds; the duration of sunshine; and the intensity of solar and terrestrial radiation.—Meteorological table. (a) A statistical table of meteorological data: also called meteorological register. (b) A table for correcting or reducing meteorological observations.

meteorologically (mē″tē-ō-rō-loj'i-kal-i), adv. In a meteorological aspect; with reference to meteorological conditions; by means of meteorology, or according to meteorological principles or methods.

meteorologist (mē″tē-ō-rol'ō-jist), n. [= F. météorologiste = Sp. meteorologista; as meteorolog-y + -ist.] One who is versed in meteorology; an expert in the conduct and discussion of meteorological observations; a student of the laws of atmospheric motions and phe-★nomena.

meteorology (mē″tē-ō-rol'ō-ji), n. [= F. météorologie = Sp. meteorología = Pg. It. meteorologia, < NL. meteorologia, < Gr. μετεωρολογία, a treatise on meteors or celestial phenomena, < μετεωρολόγος, speaking of meteors or celestial phenomena, < μετέωρον, a meteor (τὰ μετέωρα, celestial phenomena), + λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The science which treats of the motions and phenomena of the earth's atmosphere; the scientific study of weather and climate, their causes, changes, relations, and effects. Abbreviated meteor.

In sundry animals we deny not a kind of natural meteorology, or innate presentation both of wind and weather. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii. 10.

Optical meteorology, the science of the luminous phenomena of the atmosphere.—Practical or applied meteorology, the study of the bearing and effect of weather and climate on human interests. It embraces especially: (1) weather forecasts; (2) medical meteorology, or the relation of weather and climate to health and disease; and (3) agricultural meteorology, or the relation of climate and weather to vegetable growth.—The new or higher meteorology, the explanation of the motions of the atmosphere, and the origin and development of storms, by deductive mathematical processes based on the laws of hydrodynamics and thermodynamics.—Theoretical meteorology, the study of the physics and mechanics of the atmosphere, and the cosmical influences affecting terrestrial atmospherics.

meteoromancy (mē'tē-ō-rō-man″si), n. [< Gr. μετέωρον, a meteor, + μαντεία, divination.] Divination by meteoric phenomena.

meteorometer (mē″tē-ō-rom'e-tėr), n. [< Gr. μετέωρον, a meteor, + μέτρον, a measure.] An apparatus for automatically transmitting from a local station, and showing or recording at a central station, the various weather items, such as direction of wind, rainfall, barometric pressure, temperature, etc. It is usually operated ★by electricity.

meteoroscope† (mē-tē-or'ō-skōp), n. [= F. météoroscope = Sp. meteoróscopo = Pg. meteoroscopio = It. meteoroscopo, < Gr. μετεωροσκόπιον, an instrument for taking observations of the heavenly bodies, < μετεωροσκόπος, observing the heavenly bodies, < μετέωρον, a meteor, pl. celestial phenomena, + σκοπεῖν, view.] An instrument formerly in use for finding the angular distances of heavenly bodies. Diderot.

With astrolabe and meteoroscope
I'll find the cusp and alfridaria,
And know what planet is in Cazimi.
T. Tomkis (?), Albumazar, ii. 5.

meteoroscopy† (mē-tē-or′ō-skō-pi), n. [= F. météoroscopie = Sp. meteoroscopia; as meteoroscope + *-y*³.] The use of the meteoroscope.

meteorous† (mē′tē-or-us), a. [< Gr. μετέωρος, raised, on high, in air: see meteor.] Having the nature of a meteor; meteoric.

The cherubim descended; on the ground
Gliding meteorous, as evening mist Risen from a river o'er the marish glides.
Milton, P. L., xii. 629.

We must conclude that there are meteorous beings, whose eccentric orbits we know not how to describe.
I. D'Israeli, Amen. of Lit., II. 390.

meteor-system (mē-tē-or-sis″tem), n. A flock of small bodies moving together in space and acting upon each other by their mutual attractions and influences of various kinds.

Meteorus (mē-tē-ō′rus), n. [NL. (Haliday, 1835), < Gr. μετέωρος, in the air, μετέωρον, a meteor: see meteor.] An important genus of hymenopterous parasites, typical of a subfamily Meteorinæ, with many European and American species. M. hyphantriæ is a parasite of the fall web-worm, Hyphantria cunea, of the United States.

metepencephalic (met-ep-en-se-fal′ik or -sef′-a-lik), a. [< metepencephalon + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the metepencephalon.

metepencephalon (met-ep-en-sef′a-lon), n.; pl. metepencephala (-lä). [NL., < met(encephalon) + epencephalon.] A segment of the encephalon between the myelon and the mesencephalon; the metencephalon and epencephalon together considered as one segment. B. G. Wilder.

metepicœle (met-ep′i-sēl), n. [< met(encephalon) + epicœle.] The cavity of the metepencephalon; the fourth ventricle. Also metepicœlia. Wilder, N. Y. Med. Jour., March 21, 1885, p. 327.

metepimeral (met-e-pim′e-ral), a. [< metepimeron + -al.] Of or pertaining to the metepimeron.

metepimeron (met-e-pim′e-ron), n.; pl. metepimera (-rä). [NL., < Gr. μετά, after, + NL. epimeron, q. v.] In entom., the epimeron of the metathorax; the epimeral sclerite of the metapleuron.

metepisternum (met-ep-i-stėr′num), n.; pl. metepisterna (-nä). [NL., < Gr. μετά, after, + NL. episternum, q. v.] In entom., one of the metathoracic episterna.

meter[1] (mē′tėr), n. [Formerly also meeter; < ME. meter, < AS. metere* (cf. metend, a measurer) (= D. meter = MLG. meter = OHG. mezāri, mezzāri, MHG. mezzer, G. messer = Sw. mätare, a measurer), < metan, measure: see mete[1]. In the second sense, 'that which measures, an instrument for measuring,' as in gas-meter, water-meter, etc., the word is partly confused in composition with the L. metrum, < Gr. μέτρον, a measure, which is the word involved in the unitary compounds gasometer, electrometer, geometer, diameter, perimeter, etc.: see meter[2], meter[3].] 1. One who measures; a measurer: as, a coal-meter; a land-meter. [Rare.]

But the aulnager, the weigher, the meeter of grants, will not suffer us to acquiesce in the judgment of the prince.
Burke, Letter to a Noble Lord.

2. That which measures, or is used for measuring; specifically, an instrument that records or indicates automatically the quantity, force, or pressure of a fluid passing through it or actuating it: used in composition, as in gas-meter, water-meter (see these words), or alone when the fluid to be measured, as gas or water, is understood.—3. In fishing, one of the two reinforcing ropes of a seine or gill-net, of which one is attached to the upper edge and carries the floats, and the other to the lower edge and bears the weights or sinkers.—Dry meter, a gas-meter employing a bellows-like apparatus and no liquid.—Electric meter. See electric.—Electromagnetic-control meters, electrical measuring-instruments (such as ampere- or volt-meters) the indications of which are controlled by the magnetic field produced by an electromagnet. In current instruments the electromagnet is usually excited by the current to be measured.—Grain-meter, any one of a variety of automatic grain-measuring machines, by which a stream of grain flowing from a chute or hopper is received, and the quantity discharged is indicated. Most of these grain-meters are automatic weighing-machines, the standard weight of a bushel of the grain being the unit of the scale of measurement, or, if the indications are in pounds, the latter divided by the weight of a bushel at once gives the delivery in bushels.—Magnetic-control meters, electromagnetic-control meters with permanent magnets substituted for electromagnets.—Spring-control meters, electrical measuring-instruments in which the indications are controlled by the elastic resistance of a spring. (See also ampere-meter, coulomb-meter, joule-meter, volt-meter.)

meter[1] (mē′tėr), v. t. [< meter[1], n.] To measure by means of a meter; test by the use of a meter.

It was found that the real proportions of air and gas were not determinable, except by metering both.
Science, III. 497.

meter[2], metre[1] (mē′tėr), n. [Formerly also meeter; < ME. meter, metyr, metre, < OF. metre, F. mètre = Sp. Pg. It. metro = AS. meter = D. meter = OHG. mētar, MHG. mēter, G. meter = Dan. Sw. meter, meter, < L. metrum, meter (of verse) (not in sense of a measure of length), < Gr. μέτρον, that by which anything is measured, a measure or rule, also a measure of content, a space measured or measurable, measure, proportion, fitness, meter (of verse); with formative -τρον, < √με = Skt. √mā, measure, seen also in L. metiri, pp. mensus, measure, modus, measure, and AS. metan, E. mete[1]: see mete[1], mode[1], measure. The sense of a measure of length is recent, from the F., but in comp. diameter, perimeter, etc., the lit. sense 'measure' is common: see meter[3] and meter[1].] 1. (a) Rhythm in language; rhythmic language as measurable by prosodic times or uttered syllables; more specifically, arrangement of language in a succession of rhythmic movements, readily appreciable as such by the ear; verse, as opposed to prose. Meter in this sense is the subject-matter of the science of metrics. (b) Measured verse or rhythmic language; rhythmic language as determined by or divided into fixed measures. (1) A measure, foot, or dipody. See measure. [Rare.] (2) A line, verse, or period in ancient metrics; specifically, a monocolic verse or a dicolic (or tricolic) period, as opposed to a hypermetron. Meters are called monometers, dimeters, trimeters, etc., according to the number of measures in a verse, also acatalectic, catalectic, brachycatalectic, etc., meters, according to the completeness or incompleteness of the feet or measures. (3) A kind of verse; a particular variety of poetic rhythm, as expressed by the kind of feet of which the verse consists: as, iambic, dactylic, Ionic meter; a particular form of metrical composition: as, Alcaic meter, elegiac meter. In ancient metrics meters were called monoid, pure, or simple meters when they consisted of one kind of foot throughout, compound or episynthetic meters when composed of cola of different kinds of feet, mixed meters when uniting different kinds of feet within the same colon.

Lasciuious Meeters, to whose venom sound
The open eare of youth doth always listen.
Shak., Rich. II. (folio 1623), ii. 1. 19.

According to the number of the sillables contained in euery verse, the same is sayd a long or short meeter, and his shortest proportion is of foure sillables, and his longest of twelue. Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 58.

Rhime being no necessary adjunct or true ornament of poem or good verse, in longer works especially, but the invention of a barbarous age, to set off wretched matter and lame meeter. Milton, P. L., Pref.

Metre may be defined to be a succession of poetical feet arranged in regular order, according to certain types recognized as standards, in verses of a determinate length.
G. P. Marsh, Lects. on Eng. Lang., xxv.

2. In music, the division of a composition into parts of equal time-value and of similar essential rhythmic structure. The smallest part thus indicated is that between successive primary accents, and is called a measure; in printed music this is marked by a bar before each primary accent. But meter includes also, in a general way, the division of a piece into equal and similar parts of more than one measure, such parts being called phrases or strophes. In this sense musical meter has obvious analogies with meter in verse, though the analogies cannot always be pressed with safety, especially as the nomenclature is not strictly parallel. (See metrics[2], 2.) Rhythm may be distinguished from meter in that it deals primarily with the accents and the typical and actual accentual patterns, which meter gathers into groups and sections in accordance with their time-value. This distinction, however, is not always observed or even acknowledged. Sometimes the meaning of the term is reversed, rhythm being made a matter of time, and meter one of accent. Sometimes, too, the two terms are made entirely interchangeable.

3. In Eng. hymnology, a pattern of versification, including the structure of the prosodical feet used, the grouping of those feet into lines, and the grouping of lines into stanzas or strophes, popularly called verses. See foot and versification. According to the kind of feet used, meters are usually either iambic, trochaic, or dactylic. The principal iambic meters are: Common Meter (C. M.), having alternately eight and six syllables to the line; Long Meter (L. M.), having eight syllables to the line; and Short Meter (S. M.), having two lines of six syllables, followed by one of eight, and then by another of six. Each of these meters has properly four lines to the stanza, so that their syllabic scheme is as follows: C. M., 8, 6, 8, 6; L. M., 8, 8, 8, 8; S. M., 6, 6, 8, 6. Each of them may also be doubled, so as to make eight-lined stanzas, the meter then being called Common Meter Double (C. M. D.), Long Meter Double (L. M. D.), or Short Meter Double (S. M. D.). Long meter may also have six lines to the stanza, and is then called Long Meter, Six Lines or Long Particular Meter (L. P. M.), with the syllabic scheme 8, 8, 8, 8, 8, 8. Other meters of this class are Common Particular Meter (C. P. M.), 8, 8, 6, 8, 8, 6; Short Particular Meter (S. P. M.), 6, 6, 8, 6, 6, 8; Hallelujah Meter (H. M.), 6, 6, 6, 6, 6, 8, 8 (or 6, 6, 6, 6, 4, 4, 4, 4); Sevens and Sixes, 7, 6, 7, 6; Tens, 10, 10, 10, 10; etc. The principal trochaic meters are Sevens, 7, 7, 7, 7; Eights and Sevens, 8, 7, 8, 7; Sixes, 6, 6, 6, 6; Sixes and Fives, 6, 5, 6, 5; etc. The principal dactylic meters are Elevens, 11, 11, 11, 11; Elevens and Tens, 11, 10, 11, 10; etc. Numerous modifications of these schemes occur, especially in recent hymns.—Accentual meters. See accentual.—Hipponactean meter, Hymenaic meter, Ionic meter. See the adjectives.—In short meter, short meter, quickly; in short order. [U. S.]

meter[3], metre[2] (mē′tėr), n. [Also sometimes, as mere F., mètre; = Sp. Pg. It. metro (after F.), < F. mètre = D. G. Sw. Dan. meter, < L. metrum, < Gr. μέτρον, a measure: see meter[2].] The fundamental unit of length of the French metrical system. It is the distance, at the melting-temperature of ice, between the ends of a certain platinum bar preserved in Paris, and called the mètre des Archives. It was intended to be one ten-millionth part of the earth's meridian quadrant, and to be 443.296 lines of the toise of Peru, from which it really differs by a very small amount. The meter is equal to 39.37027 inches according to Professor Rogers, and 39.37011 is the value adopted by the Standards Department at London. A new meter has been established by the principal nations, which is defined by the length at the melting-point of ice between two lines drawn on a bar of platiniridium, which is to be kept at the International Bureau of Weights and Measures at the pavillon de Breteuil near Sèvres, France. This new meter is as nearly as possible of the same length as the old one. Abbreviated m.

meterage (mē′tėr-āj), n. [< meter[1] + -age.] 1. The act of measuring.—2. Measurement; the result of measuring.—3. A charge for measuring.

meterer† (mē′tėr-ėr), n. [< meter[2] + -er[1].] One who writes in meter; a poet. Drayton.

meterly† (mē′tėr-li), adv. [ME. metrely; < meter[2] + -ly[2].] Metrically.

Be it in balede, uers, rime, or prose,
He most torn and wend, metrely to close.
Rom. of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), l. 6566.

mete-rod†, n. [Early mod. E. meetrodde, metrod; < mete[1] + rod.] A measuring-rod.

The meetrodde that he hadde in his hande was syxe cubytes longe and a spanne. Bible of 1551, Ezek. xl. 5.

meter-prover (mē′tėr-prō″vėr), n. A registering holder, or a gas-tank of known capacity, used for testing the accuracy of gas-meters.

meter-wheel (mē′tėr-hwēl), n. A drum or hollow wheel with several chambers, to which air or other gas is admitted through a tube in the axle. In use, the wheel is immersed in water above its axis, and the gas, filling each chamber successively, causes the chamber filled to rise and the wheel to revolve, when the gas is discharged above the level of the water by an opening. The chambers are of known capacity, and the revolutions of the wheel are recorded on dials. Such wheels are used in gas-meters, in which the pressure of the gas flowing through the meter gives the driving power.

meteselt†, n. [ME., < AS. mete, meat, + sēl, time.] Meal-time.

metesthetic (met-es-thet′ik), a. [Also metæsthetic; < Gr. μετά, after, + αἰσθητός, verbal adj. of αἰσθάνεσθαι, perceive: see archesthetic.] Pertaining to the hypothesis of metesthetism.

metesthetism (met-es′the-tizm), n. [Also metæsthetism; < metesthetic + -ism.] The monistic hypothesis that consciousness is an attribute of matter, and a product of the evolution of matter and force: opposed to archesthetism.

metestick (mēt′stik), n. A measuring staff: specifically, a stick fixed on a board at right angles, used to measure the height of the hold of a ship, and to level the ballast.

metewand (mēt′wond), n. [Formerly also metwand; < ME. metewand; < mete[1] + wand.] A measuring-staff, yardstick, etc.; any rod or stick used to measure length. [Archaic.]

He reformed the olde untrue measures, and made a measure by the length of his own arme, which was then called vlna, an elle, and now the same is called a yard, or a metwand.
Stow, Hen. I., an. 1102.

No fitting metewand hath To-day
For measuring spirits of thy stature.
Lowell, To Lamartine.

meteyard† (mēt′yärd), n. [< ME. meteyarde, < AS. metgird, metgyrd, metgeard, a measuring-rod, < gemet, measure, + gyrd, rod: see mete[1] and yard[1].] A metewand a yard in length.

Take thou the bill, give me thy mete-yard, and spare not me. Shak., T. of the S., iv. 3. 153.

meteyn†, n. A Middle English form of mitten. Chaucer.

meth[1]†, n. [ME., < AS. mēeth, measure, degree, proportion, ability, rank, due measure, right, respect; < metan, measure: see mete[1].] Measure; moderation; modesty.

And Mari ledd hir life with methe
In a toun that hiht Nazarethe.
Metrical Homilies, p. 107.

meth[1]†, a. [ME., < meth[1], n.] Moderate; mild; courteous.

Alle that meyné mylde and meth
Went hem into Nazareth.
Cursor Mundi. (Halliwell.)

meth[2]†, n. An obsolete form of mead[1].

meth[3]†, n. [Also methe; ME., a var. of mood: see mood[1].] Anger; wrath.

Quen the lorde of the lyfte lyked hymseluen
For to mynne on his mon his meth that abydez.
Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), ii. 436.

Ne tell thou neuer at borde no tale
To harme or shame thy felawe in sale;
For if he then withholde his methe,
Eftsons he wylle forcast thi dethe.
Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 302.

methal (meth'al), n. [< meth(yl) + al(cohol).] Same as methyl alcohol (which see, under alcohol). Officially methanol.

methane (meth'ān), n. [< meth(yl) + -ane.] A hydrocarbon (CH_4) belonging to the paraffin series, a colorless, odorless gas which may be reduced to a liquid by extreme pressure and cold. It is innocuous when breathed in moderate quantity. It burns with a slightly luminous flame, and when mixed with seven or eight volumes of air explodes violently. It occurs in nature in the emanations of volcanoes and petroleum-wells. It also occurs in large quantity in the coal-measures, and when mixed with air constitutes the dreaded fire-damp of the miners. Also called marsh-gas.

methanometer (meth-ā-nom'e-tėr), n. [< methane + Gr. μέτρον, measure.] An apparatus, devised by Monnier, to determine and indicate automatically the quantity of marsh-gas (methane) in coal-mines. It depends upon the change of level of the mercury in a manometer-tube in which carbon dioxid is formed by the combination of the gas with the oxygen of the air under the action, for example, of an electric spark.

methe[1]†, n. An obsolete form of mead[1].

methe[2]†, n. See meth[3].

metheglin (mē-theg'lin), n. [< W. meddyglyn, < medd, mead (see mead[1]), + llyn, liquor.] Mead.

It is not my fault if I fill them out nectar and they run to metheglin. B. Jonson, Masque of Hymen.

O'er our parch'd tongue the rich metheglin glides.
Gay, To a Lady, i.

methemoglobin (met-hē-mō-glō'bin), n. [< Gr. μετά, with, + E. hemoglobin.] A modification of hemoglobin, into which it can be reconverted. It differs from hemoglobin in that its combined oxygen is not displaced by carbon monoxid nor given up in a vacuum.

methemoglobinemia (met-hē-mō-glō-bi-nē'mi-ä), n. [< methemoglobin + Gr. αἷμα, blood.] In pathol., the presence of methemoglobin in the blood. Med. News, LIII. 240.

methemoglobinuria (met-hē-mō-glō-bi-nū'ri-ä), n. [< methemoglobin + Gr. οὖρον, urine.] In pathol., the presence of methemoglobin in the urine.

methene (meth'-ēn), n. [< meth(yl) + -ene.] Same as methylene.

mether (meᴛʜ'-ėr), n. [Variant of madder[2].] A drinking-vessel formerly in use. The vessels identified as methers are of wood, cut out of a single piece, having a capacity of from one to three pints.

Mether, from specimen in the Museum of the Royal Irish Academy, Dublin, Ireland.

The Dunvegan cup, a mether of yew covered with silver mounts. S. K. Cat. Spec. Exhib., 1862, No. 902.

methinks (mē-thingks'), v. impers.; pret. methought. [< ME. me thinketh, < AS. mē thyncth, it seems to me: see me[1] and think[2].] It seems to me; it appears to me. See me[1] and think[2].

method (meth'od), n. [= OF. methode, F. méthode = Sp. método = Pg. methodo = It. metodo = D. G. Dan. methode = Sw. method, < LL. methodus, methodos, a way of teaching or proceeding, < Gr. μέθοδος, a going after, pursuit, investigation, inquiry, method, system, < μετά, after, + ὁδός, way.] 1. Orderly regulation of conduct with a view to the attainment of an end; systematic procedure subservient to the purpose of any business; the use of a complete set of rules for carrying out any plan or project: as, to observe method in business or study; without method success is improbable: in this and the next two senses only in the singular.

Though this be madness, yet there is method in 't.
Shak., Hamlet, ii. 2. 208.

Horace still charms with graceful negligence,
And without method talks us into sense.
Pope, Essay on Criticism, l. 654.

The particular uses of method are various: but the general one is, to enable men to understand the things that are the subjects of it.
Bentham, Introd. to Morals and Legislation, xvi. 1, note.

Where the habit of Method is present and effective, things the most remote and diverse in time, place, and outward circumstance are brought into mental contiguity and succession, the more striking as the less expected.
Coleridge, Method, § ii. (Encyc. Dict.)

2. A system, or complete set, of rules of procedure for attaining a given end; a short way to a desired result; specifically, in logic, a general plan for setting forth any branch of knowledge whatever; that branch of logic which teaches how to arrange thoughts for investigation or exposition.

Method hath been placed, and that not amiss, in logic, as a part of judgment: . . . the doctrine of method containeth the rules of judgment upon that which is to be delivered. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

Method is procedure according to principles.
Kant, Critique of Pure Reason (tr. by Meiklejohn), p. 516.

3. Any way or manner of conducting any business.

In this method of life it was once his fate to approach a clear fountain. Bacon, Moral Fables, iii.

4. A plan or system of conduct or action; the way or mode of doing or effecting something: as, a method of instruction; method of classification; the English method of pronunciation.

Therefore to know what more thou art than man, . . .
Another method I must now begin.
Milton, P. R., iv. 540.

Let such persons . . . not quarrel with the Great Physician of souls for having cured them by easy and gentle methods. South, Sermons, IX. i.

Still less respectable appears this extreme concern for those of our own blood which goes along with utter unconcern for those of other blood, when we observe its methods. H. Spencer, Man vs. State, p. 71.

5. In music: (a) Manner of performance; technique; style. (b) A manner or system of teaching. (c) An instruction-book, systematically arranged.—Acroamatic, analytic, antecedental method. See the adjectives.—Arbogast's method. [Named after the inventor, the Alsatian mathematician Louis François Antoine Arbogast, 1759–1803, who himself named it the calculus of derivations.] A method for the development of the function of a function according to the powers of the variable of the latter function.—Baconian method. See Baconian.—Catechetic method, the method of teaching by questions addressed to the memory.—Centrobaric method. See centrobaric.—Comparative method, any method of investigation which rests upon the comparison of several groups of objects.—Compositive method. Same as synthetic method.—Correlative method. See correlative.—Deductive method. See deductive.—Definitive or divisive method. See divisive.—Dialogic method. See dialogic.—Differential method. (a) A method of estimating the value of a physical quantity by comparing it with another of the same kind the value of which is known and estimating the difference. See differential, and differential galvanometer. (b) A method, introduced by Frischen, in duplex telegraphy for eliminating the effect of the transmitted current on the instruments at the transmitting station while leaving them available to record any message received at the same time. See telegraphy.—Epidermic, erotematic, Eulerian, exoscopic, expectant method. See the adjectives.—Euler's method of elimination. See elimination.—Genetic, graphical, historical method. See the adjectives.—Horner's method of approximation. See approximation.—Iatraliptic method†. Same as epidermic method.—Inductive or experimental method, a method which depends upon making new observations.—Introspective method. See introspective.—Lagrangian, lunar, magistral method. See the adjectives.—Mance's method, a method of measuring the electrical resistance of a circuit in which there is an electromotive force. See resistance.—Metaphysical or subjective method, one which rests on the assumption that the possibilities of thought are coextensive with the possibilities of things.—Method of adhesions. See the quotation.

At the recent meeting of the British Association, Dr. E. B. Tylor read an interesting paper on the laws of marriage and descent, illustrative of his ingenious method of studying ethnological phenomena. All myths and customs, on a close study, may by analysis be disintegrated, and are found to consist of certain elements. Dr. Tylor arranges these elements statistically, and, by inquiring which occur simultaneously among various peoples, proves that certain groups of such elements belong genetically together. This he calls the method of adhesions.
Science, XII. 211.

Method of agreement, that method of experimental inquiry in which, some experiment being tried under a great variety of circumstances and found always to yield the same result, it is inferred that this result would be reached under all circumstances.—Method of approaches. See approach.—Method of avoidance, a method of experimentation in which the circumstances of the observation are specially chosen so that one usual source of error does not enter into the result.—Method of compensation, a method in which a source of error of unknown amount is got rid of by a special mechanical contrivance.—Method of concomitant variations, the method in which the known quantities on which the results of an experiment depend are made to vary with a view to ascertaining the values of the unknown quantities.—Method of correction, a method of experimentation in which a source of error is allowed for by calculation. This differs from the method of residues only in that the nature of the causes of the residual phenomena are known, and only their quantities remain to be determined.—Method of difference, that method in which an experiment is tried under conditions seeming to differ in but one material circumstance, and the difference in the two results is ascribed to that circumstance.—Method of dimensions, diviscrs, exclusions, fluxions. See dimension, divisor, etc.—Method of exhaustions, the method of approximation to the area of a curvilinear figure by means of inscribed and circumscribed polygons.—Method of increments, of indivisibles, of infusion, of limits. See increment, indivisible, etc.—Method of least squares. See square.—Method of residues. (a) That method of experimental inquiry in which from an observed quantity is subtracted the effects of known causes in order that the effects of unknown causes may be studied by themselves. (b) A method invented by Cauchy of treating the integral calculus. See residual.—Method of reversal, a method in which two experiments are made under different circumstances, in such a way that their results can be combined by calculation, so that the error shall be determined and eliminated.—Natural method, a method in which the order of nature is observed. See Jussieuan.—Null-method, a method of measurement in which the equality of two physical quantities is indicated when, on performing a specified operation, no effect is produced on the testing apparatus: for example, the Wheatstone bridge method of measuring electrical resistance.—Progressive method. Same as synthetic method.—Regressive or resolutive method. Same as analytic method.—Scientific method, a method of investigation proceeding in a scientific manner, and setting out from fundamental and elementary principles; especially, the method of modern science.—Socratic method, the method of teaching by questions addressed to the understanding.—Subjective method. Same as metaphysical method.—Symbolical method. (a) A method in which symbols of operations are treated as if they were symbols of quantities. (b) A method in which, in analytical geom., the functions which vanish on straight lines, etc., are represented by single letters. (c) In algebra, a method in which, by the aid of umbræ, quantics are written as powers of polynomials.—Synthetic, progressive, or compositive method, a method in which we set out with general principles and proceed to deduce their consequences.—Tabular or tabellary method, the method of exhibiting the divisions of a subject by tables.—Total method, the method of a whole science; partial method, the method of a particular part of a science.—Universal or general method, a method applicable to all problems, or to a very wide class of problems; special or particular method, one applicable to a small class of problems.

methodic (me-thod'ik), a. [= F. méthodique = Sp. metódico = Pg. methodico = It. metodico (cf. D. G. methodisch = Dan. methodisk), < LL. methodicus, following a method (medici methodici, physicians known as methodists), < Gr. μεθοδικός, working by rule, following a method, systematic (οἱ μεθοδικοί, physicians known as methodists), < μέθοδος, a method: see method.] Pertaining to or characterized by method; conformed or conforming to a method: as, the methodic principle or sect in medicine.

The legislator whose measures produce evil instead of good, notwithstanding the extensive and methodic inquiries which helped him to decide, cannot be held to have committed more than error of reasoning.
H. Spencer, Man vs. State, p. 77.

Methodic doubt. See doubt[1].

methodical (me-thod'i-kal), a. [< methodic + -al.] Characterized by or exhibiting method; disposed or acting in a systematic way; systematic; orderly: as, the methodical arrangement of objects or topics; methodical accounts; a methodical man.

When I am old, I will be as methodical an hypocrite as any pair of lawn sleeves in Savoy.
Shirley, Grateful Servant, ii. 1.

I have done it in a confused manner, and without the nice divisions of art; for grief is not methodical.
Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, I. vi.

methodically (me-thod'i-kal-i), adv. In a methodical manner; according to a method; with method or order.

methodics (me-thod'iks), n. [Pl. of methodic: see -ics.] The science of method; methodology.

methodisation, methodise, etc. See methodization, etc.

methodism (meth'od-izm), n. [< method (see Methodist) + -ism.] 1. The principle of acting according to a fixed or strict method; the system or practice of methodists: as, methodism in medicine, or in conduct.

This system [of medical doctrine] was known as methodism, its adherents as the methodici or methodists.
Encyc. Brit., XV. 802.

Specifically—2. [cap.] The doctrines and polity of the Methodist Church. See Methodist Church, under Methodist.

★Methodist (meth′o̤d-ist), n. and a. [< method + -ist.] I. n. 1. [l. c.] One who is characterized by strict adherence to method; one who thinks or acts according to a fixed system or definite principles; one who is thoroughly versed in method.

The finest methodists, according to Aristotle's golden rule of artificiall boundes, condemne geometricall preceptes in arithmetique or arithmeticall preceptes in geometrie as irregular and abusive.
G. Harvey, Pierce's Supererogation.

The great thinkers of all times have been strict methodists. Alcott, Table-Talk, p. 128.

2. One of a sect of ancient physicians who practised by method or theory. Compare Dogmatist, 2.

As many more
As methodist Musus kild with hellebore
In autumne last.
Marston, Scourge of Villanie, Sat. i.

The methodists agreed with the empirics in one point, in their contempt for anatomy; but, strictly speaking, they were dogmatists, though with a dogma different from that of the Hippocratic school. Encyc. Brit., XV. 802.

3. A member of the Christian denomination founded by John Wesley (1703–91). The name was first applied to Wesley and his companions by their fellow-students at Oxford on account of their methodical habits in study and in religious life.

Thus Bath yields a continued rotation of diversions, and people of all ways of thinking, even from the libertine to the methodist, have it in their power to complete the day with employment agreeable to their taste and disposition.
Life of Quin (reprint 1887), p. 50.

Dialectic Methodists, a name given to certain Roman Catholic priests of France, during the seventeenth century, who opposed by argument the doctrines of the Huguenots. Also called Romish or Popish Methodists.—Free Methodists, a Methodist denomination in the United States, established in 1860 at Pekin in New York. Its members place especial emphasis upon the doctrines of entire sanctification and eternal punishment. They rigidly enforce the rule for simplicity of dress, and prohibit the use of choir or musical instrument in church service; they have abandoned episcopacy, and have one superintendent elected every four years.

II. a. Of or pertaining to Methodism or the Methodists; belonging to or agreeing with the general body of Methodists: as, Methodist principles; a Methodist church.—The Methodist Church, a Christian body existing in several distinct church organizations, the most important of which are that known in England as the Wesleyan and that known in the United States as the Methodist Episcopal Church. These two bodies do not differ materially in doctrine, worship, or ecclesiastical organization. They are evangelical, and Arminian in theology. Their worship is generally non-liturgical. Each Methodist society, or local church, is organized in classes, under class-leaders; the different societies, which are sometimes grouped in circuits, are combined in districts, each of which is, in the United States, under the superintendence of a presiding elder. The American churches also have bishops, who are not diocesan, but itinerant, possessing concurrent jurisdiction over the whole church. The highest ecclesiastical court is the General Conference, which meets every fourth year. In the United States lay delegates have been admitted to the Conference since 1872, and in England since 1880, before which dates the Conference was a purely clerical body. Other Methodist churches are: The Welsh Calvinistic Methodists, Calvinistic in theology, formed from the Countess of Huntingdon's Connection, which is Congregational in polity; the Methodist New Connection, which gives a larger degree of power to the laity than does the Old Connection; the Bible Christians; the Primitive Methodists; the United Methodist Free Churches, a combination of three preëxisting Methodist organizations; and the Wesleyan Reform Union. All the above are British organizations. In the United States, the Methodist Episcopal Church exists in two distinct organizations, the Methodist Episcopal Church, and the Methodist Episcopal Church (South). There is also an African Methodist Episcopal Church, an African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church in America, the Union American Methodist Episcopal Church—all composed entirely of colored Methodists; the Evangelical Association, popularly though inaccurately termed German Methodists, or Albrights, from the name of their founder; the United Brethren in Christ, which is essentially though not nominally a Methodist body; the Methodist Protestant Church, which rejects episcopacy; and the Wesleyan Methodist Connection of America. In Canada several of the Methodist bodies have been consolidated into a single organization, called the Methodist Church of Canada. All these bodies agree in having a consolidated ministry for each body, and in each, with the exception of the Methodist Episcopal Church (which in 1900, at its quadrennial session, removed the time limit), ministers are subject to change of parish within certain definite periods—a feature of Methodist economy called "the itinerancy." methodistic (meth-o̤-dis′tik), a. [< methodist + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to methodism or methodists; characterized by or exhibiting strict adherence to method; hence, strict or exacting, as in religion or morals.

Then spare our stage, ye methodistic men!
Byron, Hints from Horace.

2. [cap.] Of or pertaining to the Methodist Church; characteristic of the Methodists or Methodism: as, Methodistic principles or practices.

Methodistical (meth-o̤-dis′ti-kal), a. [< methodistic + -al.] Same as Methodistic, 2.

The precise number of methodistical marks you know best. Bp. Lavington, Enthusiasm of Methodists and Papists Compared, p. xii.

methodistically (meth-o̤-dis′ti-kal-i), adv. In a methodistic manner; specifically [cap.], after the manner of the Methodists; as regards Methodism.

methodization (meth″o̤d-i-zā′shon), n. [< methodize + -ation.] The act or process of methodizing or reducing to method; the state of being methodized. Also spelled methodisation.

The conceptions, then, which we employ for the colligation and methodization of facts do not develop themselves from within, but are impressed upon the mind from without. J. S. Mill, Logic, IV. ii. § 2.

methodize (meth′o̤d-īz), v.; pret. and pp. methodized, ppr. methodizing. [< method + -ize.] I. trans. To reduce to method; dispose in due order; arrange in a convenient manner.

The wisdom of God hath methodized the course of things unto the best advantage of goodness.
Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., i. 30.

Science . . . is simply common sense rectified, extended, and methodized. J. Fiske, Cosmic Philos., I. 124.

II. intrans. To be methodical; use method.

The mind . . . is disposed to generalize and methodize to excess. Coleridge, Method, § 1.

Also spelled methodise.

methodizer (meth′o̤d-ī-zėr), n. One who methodizes. Also spelled methodiser.

He was a careful methodizer of his knowledge.
Scudder, Noah Webster, p. 215.

★methodological (meth″o̤d-ō-loj′i-kal), a. [< methodolog-y + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to methodology.

If there were several competing methods of geometry . . . geometers would inevitably be involved at the outset of their study in methodological discussion.
H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 5.

methodologist (meth-o̤-dol′o̤-jist), n. [< methodolog-y + -ist.] One who is versed in or treats of methodology.

methodology (meth-o̤-dol′o̤-ji), n. [< Gr. μέθοδος, method, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] 1. A branch of logic whose office it is to show how the abstract principles of the science are to be applied to the production of knowledge; the doctrine of definition and division; in a broader sense, the science of method in scientific procedure.

That part of logic which is conversant with the perfection, with the well-being of thought is the doctrine of method—methodology.
Sir W. Hamilton, Lectures on Logic, xxiv.

The rival originators of modern Methodology, Descartes and Bacon, vie with each other in the stress that they lay on this point: and the latter's warning against the "notiones male terminatæ" of ordinary thought is peculiarly needed in ethical discussion.
H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 318.

2. A treatise on method.

methomania (meth-ō-mā′ni-ạ), n. [NL., < Gr. μέθη, μέθυ, strong drink (see mead[1]), + μανία, madness.] In pathol., an irresistible morbid craving for intoxicating substances; dipsomania.

Dipsomania is a form of physical disease, and it has been aptly defined as an uncontrollable and intermittent impulse to take alcoholic stimulants, or any other agent . . . which causes intoxication—in short, a methomania.
E. C. Mann, Psychol. Med., p. 354.

methought (mē-thât′). Preterit of methinks.

methridatum, n. See mithridatum.

methule (meth′ūl), n. Same as methyl.

methy (meth′i), n.; pl. methies (-iz). [Wood Cree mithy.] A name of the burbot.

★methyl (meth′il), n. [< Gr. μέθυ, mead, + ὕλη, wood.] The hypothetical radical (CH_3) of wood-spirit and its derivatives. It is analogous to ethyl in its chemical relations.—Methyl alcohol, green, mercaptan. See alcohol, etc.

methylal (meth′il-al), n. [< methyl + al(cohol).] Methylene dimethyl ether, $CH_2(OCH_3)_2$, a liquid product of the oxidation of methylic alcohol. It has a pleasant odor, and by oxidation passes into formic acid.

methylamine (meth′il-am-in), n. [< methyl + amine.] A colorless gas (NH_2CH_3), having a strong ammoniacal odor, and resembling ammonia in many of its reactions. It may be regarded as ammonia (NH_3) in which the radical methyl (CH_3) has been substituted for a hydrogen atom. When brought in contact with a lighted taper it burns with a livid yellowish flame. Methylamine may be condensed to a liquid; it has not been solidified. It is exceedingly soluble in water, and forms, with acids, crystallizable salts.

methyl-blue (meth′il-blö), n. A coal-tar color prepared by treating spirit-blue (see spirit-blue, 2) with methyl chlorid. It is used to dye light-blue tints on silk, and possesses a purer tone than spirit-blue.

methylconine (meth′il-kō-nin), n. [< methyl + conine.] One of the alkaloids found in commercial conine.

methylcrotonic (meth″il-krō-ton′ik), a. In chem., used only in the following phrase:—Methylcrotonic acid. Same as cevadic acid (which see, under cevadic).

methylene-blue (meth′i-lēn-blö), n. A coal-tar color prepared by treating dimethylaniline successively with hydrochloric acid, sodium nitrite, sulphureted hydrogen, common salt, and zinc chlorid. It is used in dyeing, and produces fast blues on cotton, leather, and jute, but not on wool or silk. It is also an important bacterioscopic reagent.

methylic (me-thil′ik), a. [< methyl + -ic.] Containing or related to the radical methyl.—Methylic alcohol, ether, etc. See the nouns.

methyl-salicylic (meth-il-sal-i-sil′ik), a. Containing methyl in combination with salicylic acid.—Methyl-salicylic acid, the methyl ester of salicylic acid, and the chief ingredient of wintergreen-oil, from Gaultheria procumbens, a colorless, agreeably smelling oil which forms salts that are easily decomposed.

★methyl-violet (meth-il-vī′o̤-let), n. A coal-tar color produced by the direct oxidation of pure dimethylaniline with chlorid of copper. Also called Paris violet.

methymnion (meth-im′ni-on), n.; pl. methymnia (-ạ). [NL., < Gr. μεθύμνια, < μετά, after, + ὕμνος, hymn.] In anc. pros., a short colon after an antistrophe.

methysis (meth′i-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μέθυσις, drunkenness, < μεθύειν, to be drunken with wine.] In pathol., drunkenness; intoxication.

metic (met′ik), n. [Irreg. for metec*, < L. metœcus, < Gr. μέτοικος, a resident alien, prop. adj., changing one's abode, < μετά, over (denoting change), + οἶκος, house, abode: see economy.] An emigrant or immigrant; specifically, in ancient Greece, a resident alien who in general bore the burdens of a citizen, and had some of the citizen's privileges; hence, any resident alien.

To all men, rich and poor, citizens and metics, the comparative excellence of the democracy . . . was now manifest. Grote, Hist. Greece, VI. 2.

The Patricians, as distinguished from the Patres, formed an aristocracy as compared with their freedmen or other dependents, or with the metics or strangers that sojourned among them, or with the alien population that were permitted, on terms more or less hard, to cultivate their lands. W. E. Hearn, Aryan Household, p. 192.

meticulous (mē-tik′ū-lus), a. [= F. méticuleux, < L. meticulosus, full of fear, < metus, fear.] Timid; over-careful.

Melancholy and meticulous heads. Sir T. Browne.

A stylist of Plato's super-subtle and meticulous consistency. Amer. Jour. Philol., IX. 299.

meticulously† (mē-tik′ū-lus-li), adv. Timidly.

Move circumspectly, not meticulously.
Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., i. 33.

metif (mē′tif), n. [< F. métif, OF. mestif, of mixed breed: see mastiff, and cf. mestee, mestizo.] The offspring of a white person and a quadroon.

meting[1] (mē′ting), n. [ME. meting, < AS. metung, verbal n. of metan, mete: see mete[1].] Measuring.

meting[2]†, n. A Middle English form of meeting.

meting[3]†, n. [ME. metynge, < AS. mǣting, verbal n. of mǣtan, dream: see mete[2].] A dream.

Metis (mē′tis), n. [< Gr. Μῆτις, daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, and sometimes called the mother of Athene; a personification of μῆτις, wisdom, prudence.] 1. In Gr. myth., a goddess personifying prudence, daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, and first wife of Zeus.—2. The ninth of the planetoids in the order of discovery, first observed by Graham at Markree, Ireland, in April, 1848.—3. A genus of crustaceans.—4. A genus of mollusks. Adams, 1858.

métis (mā-tēs′), n. [F.: see mestizo.] 1. Same as mestizo.—2. In the Dominion of Canada, a half-breed of French and Indian parentage: especially the half-breeds of the Canadian Northwest Territories.

I am aware that the mixture of French and Indian blood has produced the well-known class of métis, half-breeds. Amer. Jour. Philol., VIII. 151.

metœcious (me-tē′shius), a. [NL., < Gr. μετά, beyond, + οἶκος, a house.] Heterœcious.

metœcism (me-tē′sizm), n. [< metœc-ious + -ism.] Heterœcism.

metoleic (met-ō-lē-ik), a. [< Gr. μετά, with, after, + E. oleic.] Related to oleic acid or olein.—Metoleic acid, a liquid acid resulting from the action of sulphuric acid on oleic acid.

Metonic (me-ton′ik), a. [< Meton, < L. Meton, Meto(n-), < Gr. Μέτων, Meton (see def.).] Of or pertaining to Meton, an ancient Athenian astronomer.—Metonic cycle. See cycle[1].—Metonic year. See Metonic cycle, under cycle[1].

metonymic (met-ō-nim′ik), a. [= Pg. metonymico = It. metonimico, < Gr. μετωνυμικός, belonging to metonymy, < μετωνυμία, metonymy: see metonymy.] Pertaining to or of the nature of metonymy; used by way of metonymy metonymical (met-ō-nim′i-kal), a. [< metonymic + -al.] Same as metonymic.

Intricate turnings, by a transumptive and metonymical kind of speech, are called meanders. Drayton, Rosamond to King Henry, note 2.

metonymically (met-ō-nim′i-kal-i), adv. By metonymy.

metonymy (me-ton′i-mi), n. [= F. métonymie = Sp. metonimia = It. metonimia, metonomia, < LL. metonymia, < Gr. μετωνυμία, a change of name (in rhet., as defined), < μετά, after, + ὄνομα, Æolic ὄννυμα, name: see onym.] In rhet., change of name; a trope or figure of speech that consists in substituting the name of one thing for that of another to which the former bears a known and close relation. It is a method of increasing the force or comprehensiveness of expression by the employment of figurative names that call up conceptions or associations of ideas not suggested by the literal ones, as Heaven for God, the Sublime Porte for the Turkish government, head and heart for intellect and affection, the town for its inhabitants, the bottle for strong drink, etc. See synecdoche.

These and such other speaches, where ye take the name of the Author for the thing it selfe, or the thing conteining for that which is contained, & in many other cases do as it were wrong name the person or the thing. So neuerthelesse as it may be vnderstood, it is by the figure metonymia, or misnamer. Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 151.

metope (met′ō-pē), n. [= F. métope = Sp. metopa = Pg. It. metopa, < L. metopa, < Gr. μετόπη, the space between the triglyphs of a frieze, < μετά, between, + ὀπή, an aperture, hollow.] 1. In arch., a slab inserted between two triglyphs of the Doric frieze, sometimes, especially in late work, cut in the same block with one triglyph or more. It was so called because in the primitive Doric, of which the later triglyphs represent the ends of the ceiling-beams, the metopes were left open as windows, and were thus literally apertures between the beams. The metopes were characteristically ornamented with sculpture in high relief, but they were frequently left plain, or adorned simply with painting. See cuts under Doric, monotriglyph, and temple.

Actæon and Artemis.—Metope from the southern temple of the eastern plateau of Selinus.

2. In zoöl., same as facies. Huxley.

metopic (me-top′ik), a. [< Gr. μέτωπον, the forehead, front, lit. the space between the eyes, < μετά, between, + ὤψ (ὠπ-), eye.] Of or pertaining to the forehead: as, a metopic suture.—Metopic point, a point midway between the greatest protuberances of the right and left frontal eminences. See craniometry.—Metopic suture, the median suture uniting the two halves of the frontal bone, present in early life and sometimes visible in adult skulls. Also called frontal suture.

Metopidius (met-ō-pid′i-us), n. [NL. (Wagler, 1832), < Gr. μετωπίδιος, equiv. to μετωπιαῖος, of or pertaining to the forehead, < μετώπιον, μέτωπον, the forehead: see metopic.] A genus of Indian and African grallatorial birds of the family Parridæ or Jacanidæ, characterized by the laminar expansion of the radius and the reduction of the spur on the wing. There are several species, as M. africanus, M. indicus, and others.

Metopidius.
r, expanded radius; u, ulna; h, humerus.

metopism (met′ō-pizm), n. [< metop-ic + -ism.] That character of an adult skull presented in the persistence of a frontal or metopic suture.

metoposcopic (met″ō-pō-skop′ik), a. [= F. métoposcopique; as metoposcop-y + -ic.] Relating to metoposcopy.

metoposcopical (met″ō-pō-skop′i-kal), a. [< metoposcopic + -al.] Same as metoposcopic.

A physiognomist might have exercised the metoposcopical science upon it [a face]. Scott, Abbot, xxxii.

metoposcopist (met-ō-pos′kō-pist), n. [< metoposcop-y + -ist.] One versed in metoposcopy.

Apion speaks of the metoposcopists who judge by the appearance of the face. Encyc. Brit., XIX. 4.

metoposcopy (met-ō-pos′kō-pi), n. [= F. métoposcopie = Sp. metoposcopia = Pg. It. metoposcopia, < Gr. μέτωπον, the forehead, front, + σκοπεῖν, view.] The study of physiognomy; the art of discovering the character or the dispositions of men by their features or the lines of the face.

Other signs [of melancholy] there are taken from physiognomy, metoposcopy, chiromancy. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 39.

metosteon (me-tos′tē-on), n.; pl. metostea (-ä). [NL., < Gr. μετά, after, + ὀστέον, a bone.] In ornith., the posterior lateral piece or special ossification of the sternum, behind the pleurosteon, on each side of the lophosteon. See cut under carinate.

metovum (me-tō′vum), n.; pl. metova (-vä). [NL., < Gr. μετά, after, + L. ovum (= Gr. ᾠόν), egg: see ovum.] A meroblastic egg, ovum, or ovule which has acquired its store of food-yolk, or been otherwise modified from its original primitive condition as an egg-cell or protovum. Also called after-egg and deutovum.

metralgia (mē-tral′ji-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. μήτρα, womb, + ἄλγος, pain.] In pathol., pain in the womb.

metran (met′ran), n. The abuna; the head of the Abyssinian or Ethiopic church.

metre[1], n. See meter[2].

metre[2], n. See meter[3].

metrectopia (met-rek-tō′pi-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. μήτρα, womb (see matrix), + ἔκτοπος, out of place: see ectopia.] Displacement of the womb. Thomas, Med. Dict.

metrectopic (met-rek-top′ik), a. [< metrectopia + -ic.] Pertaining to or affected with metrectopia.

metretet, n. [ME., < L. metreta, < Gr. μετρητής, an Athenian measure for liquids (about 9 English gallons), < μετρεῖν, measure, < μέτρον, measure: see meter[3].] An ancient liquid measure. The Attic, Macedonian, and Spanish metrete was about 40 liters, or 10½ United States gallons. The Lacedemonian and Eginetan measure was about 55 liters. In Egypt the artaba was sometimes called a metrete.

Of fynest must in oon metrete,
Or it be atte the state of his fervence,
VIII unce of grounden wermode in a shete Dependaunt honge, and XLti dayes swete; Thenne oute it take.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 203.

★metric[1] (met′rik), a. [< NL. metricus, < Gr. μετρικός, taken in the lit. sense 'pertaining to measure,' < μέτρον, measure: see meter[3], and cf. metric[2], metric[3].] Quantitative; involving or relating to measures or measuring. See ★geometry.

★metric[2] (met′rik), a. and n. [I. a. = F. métrique = Sp métrico = Pg. It. metrico (cf. D. metriek, metrisch = G. metrisch = Dan. Sw. metrik, < NL. metrica, < Gr. μετρική (sc. τέχνη), the art of meter, prosody, fem. of μετρικός, pertaining to meter: see above.] I. a. Having meter or poetic rhythm; pertaining to meter or to metrics; metrical.

Hesiod with his metric fragments of rustic wisdom. J. S. Blackie.

II. n. Same as metrics[2].

Let the writer on metric write the poet's scores mathematically. Trans. Amer. Philol. Ass., XVI. 87.

metric[3] (met′rik), a. [< F. métrique (= Sp métrico = Pg. It. metrico (after F.), < NL metricus, pertaining to the system based on the meter, < metrum, a meter: see meter[3], and cf. metric[1], metric[2].] Pertaining to that system of weights and measures of which the meter is the fundamental unit.—Metric system, the system of measurement of which the meter is the fundamental unit. First adopted in France (definitely in 1799), it is in general use in most other civilized countries, except the English-speaking countries, and is now almost universally adopted for scientific measurements. Its use is permitted in Great Britain, and was legalized in the United States in 1866. The meter, the unit of length, was intended to be one ten-millionth part of the earth's meridian quadrant, and is so very nearly. Its length is 39.370 inches. (See meter[3].) The unit of surface is the are, which is 100 square meters. The theoretical unit of volume is the stere, which is a cubic meter. The unit of volume for the purposes of the market is the liter, which is the volume of 1 kilogram of distilled water at its maximum density, and is therefore intended to be 1 cubic decimeter. For 10 times, 100 times, 1,000 times, and 10,000 times one of the above units, the prefixes deca-, hecto-, kilo-, and myria- are used. For $\frac{1}{10}$, $\frac{1}{100}$, $\frac{1}{1000}$ of the respective units, deci-, centi-, and milli- are prefixed. The micron, adopted by the international commission, is one millionth of a meter. The following is a complete table of equivalents:

1 myriameter	=	5.4 nautical miles, or 6.21 statute miles.
1 kilometer	=	0.621 statute mile, or nearly ⅝ mile.
1 hectometer	=	109.4 yards.
1 decameter	=	0.497 chain, or 1.988 rods.
1 meter	=	39.37 inches, or nearly 3 feet 3⅜ inches.
1 decimeter	=	3.937 inches.
1 centimeter	=	0.3937 inch.
1 millimeter	=	0.03937 inch, or 1-25.4 inch.
1 micron	=	$\frac{1}{25400}$ inch.
1 hectare	=	2.471 acres.
1 are	=	119.6 square yards.
1 centiare (or square meter)	=	10.764 square feet.
1 decastere	=	13 cubic yards, or about 2¾ cords.
1 stere (or cubic meter)	=	1.308 cubic yards, or 35.3 cubic feet.
1 decistere	=	3½ cubic feet.
1 kiloliter	=	1 tun 12 gallons 2 pints 2 gills old wine-measure.
1 hectoliter	=	22.01 imperial gallons, or 26.4 United States gallons.
1 decaliter	=	2 gallons 1 pint 2⅝ gills imperial measure, or 2 gallons 2 quarts 1 pint ½ gill United States measure.
1 liter	=	1 pint 3 gills imperial, or 1 quart ½ gill United States measure.
1 deciliter	=	0.704 gill imperial, or 0.845 gill United States measure.
1 millier	=	2,204.6 pounds avoirdupois.
1 metric quintal	=	2 hundredweight less 3½ pounds, or 220 pounds 7 ounces.
1 kilogram	=	2 pounds 3 ounces 4⅜ drams avoirdupois.
1 hectogram	=	3 ounces 8⅜ drams avoirdupois.
1 decagram	=	154.32 grains troy.
1 gram	=	15.43234874 grains.
1 decigram	=	1.5432 grains.
1 centigram	=	0.15432 grain.
1 milligram	=	0.015432 grain.

Closely connected with the metric system was the proposed division of the right angle or circular quadrant into 100 equal parts instead of 90 degrees: but this has not met with favor, mainly because the name degrees was retained, introducing a risk of confusion. See gram[2].

metrical[1] (met′ri-kal), a. [< metric[1] + -al.] Pertaining to measurement, or the use of weights and measures; employed in or determined by measuring: as, a metrical unit of length or quantity; the metrical systems of the ancients.

If we agree to accept a precise metrical quantity of one metal as our standard. Jevons, Money, p. 69.

Metrical diagram. See diagram.—Metrical property or proposition. See descriptive property, under descriptive.

metrical[2] (met′ri-kal), a. [< metric[2] + -al.] Pertaining to or characterized by poetical measure or rhythm; written in verse; metric: as, metrical terms; the metrical psalms.

The Poesie metricall of the Grecians and Latines came to be much corrupted and altered. Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 7.

metrically (met′ri-kal-i), adv. In a metrical manner; measuredly; as regards meter.

metrician (mē-trish′an), n. [< metric[2] + -ian.] A writer of verse; one who is skilled in meters.

Ye that bene metriciens me excuse. Court of Love, l. 30.

These Latin metricians . . . seem in their scanning of poetry to have beat time in the same way. J. Hadley, Essays, p. 97.

metricist (met'ri-sist), n. [< metric[2] + -ist.] A metrical writer; a metrician.

Counterpoint, therefore, is not to be achieved by the metricist, even though he be Pindar himself.
Encyc. Brit., XIX. 262.

★ metrics[1] (met'riks), n. [Pl. of metric[1]: see -ics.] The philosophical and mathematical theory of measurement.

metrics[2] (met'riks), n. [Pl. of metric[2]: see -ics.] 1. The art of versification.—2. The science or doctrine which treats of rhythm in language and its employment in poetic composition. Both as an art and as a science metrics is a branch of rhythmics, and relates to rhythm in language as music or harmonics does to musical rhythm, and orchestics (regarded as an art or science by the ancients) to rhythm in the movements of the body. It is a distinct science from grammar in its proper sense, the only department of which approaching metrics is that called prosody — that is, the study of quantity or the determination of longs and shorts in spoken language. As a matter of convenience grammars have added to this elementary or empiric treatises on versification, and so in traditional and popular usage prosody is made equivalent to metrics. In metrical composition the unit is the time (mora) or the syllable. In the nomenclature of modern metrics syllables combine into feet or measures, these into lines, and lines into stanzas or strophes. In the more exact and complete terminology of ancient metrics times or syllables combine into feet or measures, measures into cola, lines (verses), or periods, periods into systems or strophes, strophes into pericopes, and lines, periods, systems, or pericopes into poems. Also metric.

Metridium (mē-trid'i-um), n. [NL., < Gr. μητρίδιος, < μήτρα, womb: see matrix.] A genus of sea-anemones. M. marginatum is the commonest sea-anemone of the New England coast, found in abundance in quiet tide-pools on rocks and submerged timber. When full-blown or distended with water this actinia may be eight or ten inches in diameter.

Sea-anemone (Metridium marginatum), open and closed.

metrification (met″ri-fi-kā'shon), n. [< metrify + -ation (see -fication).] The making of verses; a metrical composition. [Rare.]

Should I flounder awhile without a tumble Through this metrification of Catullus.
Tennyson, Hendecasyllabics.

metrifier (met'ri-fī-ėr), n. A metrist; a versifier.

metrify (met'ri-fī), v. t. and i.; pret. and pp. metrified, ppr. metrifying. [< OF. metrifier, < ML. metrificare, write in meter, < L. metrum, meter (see meter[2]), + facere, make: see -fy.] To put into meter; make a metrical version of; also, to compose verse. Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 79.

Metriinæ (met-ri-i'nē), n. pl. [< Metrius + -inæ.] A group of beetles of the family Carabidæ, typified by the genus Metrius, having the body not pedunculate, the posterior coxæ separated, the prosternum prolonged at the tip, and the mandibles with a setigerous puncture. Also Metriini, as a tribe of Carabinæ.

metrist (mē'trist), n. [= Sp. metrista, < ML. metrista, a writer in meter, a poet, < L. metrum, meter: see meter[2] and -ist.] One who is versed in poetic meter or rhythm; a metrical writer; a metrician.

Coleridge himself, from natural fineness of ear, was the best metrist among modern English poets.
Lowell, Study Windows, p. 267.

metritis (mē-trī'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. μήτρα (see matrix), womb, + -itis.] In pathol., inflammation of the uterus, especially of its middle coat.

Metrius (met'ri-us), n. [NL., < Gr. μέτριος, of moderate size, < μέτρον, measure: see meter[2].] The typical genus of Metriinæ, founded by Eschscholtz in 1829. M. contractus is a Californian species found in woods under stones.

metrocarcinoma (mē-trō-kär-si-nō'mä), n.; pl. metrocarcinomata (-ma-tä). [NL., < Gr. μήτρα, womb, + καρκίνωμα, a cancer: see carcinoma.] In pathol., carcinoma of the uterus.

metrochrome (met'rō-krōm), n. [< Gr. μέτρον, a measure, + χρῶμα, color.] An instrument for measuring colors.

metrocracy (mē-trok'rą-si), n. [< Gr. μήτηρ, mother, + -κρατία, < κρατεῖν, rule.] Rule by the mother of the family.

The theory which regards metrocracy and communal marriage as a stage through which the human race in general has passed. The Academy, Feb. 15, 1888, p. 136.

metrograph (met'rō-grȧf), n. [< Gr. μέτρον, a measure, + γράφειν, write.] An apparatus for measuring and recording the rate of speed of a railway locomotive at any moment, and the time of arrival at and departure from each station.

metroïacon (met-rō-ī'ą-kon), n.; pl. metroïaca (-kä). [LL., also metroïacum, < Gr. μητρῳακόν, neut. of μητρῳακός, equiv. to μητρῷος, of a mother, specifically of Cybele as the mother of the gods, < μήτηρ, mother: see mother[1].] In pros., same as galliambus.

metrological (met-rō-loj'i-kąl), a. [< metrolog-y + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to metrology.

metrologist (met-rol'ǫ-jist), n. [< metrolog-y + -ist.] A student of or an expert in metrology.

metrology (met-rol'ǫ-ji), n. [= F. métrologie = Sp. metrología = Pg. It. metrologia, < Gr. μέτρον, a measure, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The science of weights and measures. It has two parts, one relating to the art of weighing and measuring, and the other accumulating facts in regard to units of measure which are now or have formerly been in use.—Documentary metrology, the science of ancient weights and measures based upon the study of monuments, especially of standards in regard to which there is sufficient evidence that they were intended to represent certain measures.—Historical metrology, the investigation of the weights and measures of the past, and especially of the ancients. It is divided into documentary and inductive metrology.—Inductive metrology, that based upon the measurement of a large number of objects in regard to any one of which there is little or no evidence that it was intended to have any exact measure.

metromania (met-rō-mā'ni-ą), n. [= F. métromanie = Sp. metromanía = Pg. metromania, < Gr. μέτρον, measure, + μανία, madness.] A mania for writing poetry.

metromaniac (met-rō-mā'ni-ak), a. [< metromania + -ic.] Characteristic of or affected with metromania; excessively fond of writing verses.

He seems to have [suddenly] acquired the facility of versification, and to display it with almost metromaniac eagerness.
W. Taylor, Survey of German Poetry, I. 183. (Davies.)

metrometer[1] (met-rom'e-tėr), n. [< Gr. μέτρον, measure, + μέτρον, measure.] Same as metronome.

metrometer[2] (met-rom'e-tėr), n. [< Gr. μήτρα, the womb, + μέτρον, measure.] Same as hysterometer.

metronome (met'rǫ-nōm), n. [= F. métronome, < Gr. μέτρον, a measure, + νόμος, law: see nome[3].] A mechanical contrivance for marking time, especially as an aid in musical study or performance. In its usual form it consists of a double pendulum (oscillating on a pivot near its center), the lower end of which is weighted with a ball of lead, while the upper end carries a weight of brass that may be moved up or down. When the latter weight is moved up, the rate of oscillation is slower; when it is moved down, the rate is faster. The upper end of the pendulum is graduated, so that any desired number of oscillations per minute can be secured. The whole is connected with clockwork having a strong spring, whereby the oscillation may be maintained for several minutes, and each oscillation may be marked by a distinct tick or clack. The invention of the metronome was claimed by J. N. Maelzel in 1816, but it is probable that he only adapted and introduced it to general use. The instrument is used for recording the tempo desired by a composer, and also as a means of teaching beginners the habit of keeping strict time. Its use is indicated in printed music by the metronomic mark (which see, under mark[1]). Sometimes an attachment is added for striking a bell at every second, third, fourth, or sixth oscillation, so as to mark primary accents: such a metronome is called a bell-metronome. Various other metronomes have been invented, most of which are based upon the pendulum principle. Abbreviated M.

Maelzel's Metronome.

metronomic (met-rǫ-nom'ik), a. [< metronome + -ic.] Pertaining to a metronome, or to tempo as indicated by a metronome.—Metronomic mark. See mark[1].

metronomy (met-ron'ǫ-mi), n. [< metronome + -y.] The act, process, or science of using a metronome, or of indicating tempo by reference to a metronome.

★ metronymic (met-rō-nim'ik), a. and n. [< Gr. μητρωνυμικός, named after one's mother, < μήτηρ, mother, + ὄνομα, Æolic ὄννμα, name: see onym. Cf. matronymic, patronymic.] I. a. Derived from the name of a mother or other female ancestor: correlative to patronymic: as, a metronymic name.

II. n. A maternal name; a name derived from the mother or a maternal ancestor.

Of metronymics, as we may call them, used as personal descriptions, we find examples both before and after the Conquest. E. A. Freeman, Norman Conquest, V. 880.

metroperitonitis (mē-trǫ-per″i-tǫ-nī'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. μήτρα, the womb, + NL. peritonitis, q. v.] In pathol., inflammation of the uterus and peritoneum.

metrophlebitis (mē″trǫ-flē-bī'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. μήτρα, the womb, + NL. phlebitis, q. v.] Inflammation of the veins of the womb.

metropole (met'rǫ-pōl), n. [< OF. metropole, F. métropole: see metropolis.] 1. A metropolis.

Dublin being the metropole and chiefe citie of the whole land, and where are hir maiesties principall and high courts. Holinshed, Ireland, an. 1578.

2. The see of a metropolitan.

metropolis (mē-trop'ǫ-lis), n. [= F. métropole = Sp. metrópoli = Pg. It. metropoli, < LL. metropolis, < Gr. μητρόπολις, a mother state or city (a state or city in relation to its colonies), also a capital city, < μήτηρ, = E. mother, + πόλις, state, city: see police.] 1. In ancient Greece, the mother city or parent state of a colony, as Corinth of Corcyra and Syracuse, or Phocæa of Massalia (Marseilles), the colony being independent, but usually maintaining close relations with the metropolis.

This Sidon, the auncient Metropolis of the Phœnicians (now called Saito), in likelihood was built by Sidon.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 90.

Colonies may be regarded as independent states, attached to their metropolis by ties of sympathy and common descent, but no further.
W. Smith, Dict. Greek and Roman Antiq., p. 314.

2. Later, a chief city; a seat of government; in the early church, the see or chief city of an ecclesiastical province.

We stopped at Pavia, that was once the metropolis of a kingdom, but at present a poor town.
Addison, Travels in Italy.

3. In modern usage: (a) Specifically, the see or seat of a metropolitan bishop.

That so stood out against the holy church,
The great metropolis and see of Rome.
Shak., K. John, v. 2. 72.

Marcianopolis lost its metropolitical rights, though it still continued a See; and Debeltus or Zagara became the Metropolis of the province.
J. M. Neale, Eastern Church, i. 44.

(b) The capital city or seat of government of a country, as London, Paris, or Washington. (c) A chief city; a city holding the first rank in any respect within a certain territorial range: as, New York is the commercial metropolis of the United States.— 4. In zoögeog. and bot., the place of most numerous representation of a species by individuals, or of a genus by species; the focus of a generic area. See generic.

metropolitan (met-rǫ-pol'i-tan), a. and n. [= F. métropolitain = Sp. Pg. It. metropolitano, < LL. metropolitanus, of a metropolis, < metropolis, a metropolis: see metropolis.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to a metropolis, in any sense; residing in or connected with a metropolis: as, metropolitan enterprise; metropolitan police.

The eclipse
That metropolitan volcanoes make,
Whose Stygian throats breathe darkness all day long.
Cowper, Task, iii. 727.

2. Of or pertaining to the chief see of an ecclesiastical province: as, a metropolitan church.

A bishop at that time had power in his own diocese over all other ministers there, and a metropolitan bishop sundry preëminence above other bishops.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity, vii. § 8.

Very near the metropolitan church there are several pieces of marble entablatures and columns.
Pococke, Description of the East, II. i. 253.

II. n. 1. A citizen of the mother city or parent state of a colony. See metropolis, 1.

Both metropolitans and colonists styled themselves Hellens, and were recognized as such by each other.
Grote, Hist. Greece, II. 315.

2. Eccles.: (a) In the early Christian church, the bishop of the municipal capital of a province or eparchy, who had a general ecclesiastical superintendence over the bishops and churches of his province, confirmed, ordained, and when necessary excommunicated the bishops, and convened and presided over the provincial synods. The superiority in rank of the bishops of the principal sees was so early established that many authorities have held that the office of metropolitan (including also under this title the primates of patriarchal sees) was of apostolic origin. In the developed organization under the Christian emperors a metropolitan ranked above an ordinary bishop and below a patriarch or exarch. In medieval times the power of most of the metropolitans in western countries became much diminished, while that of the diocesan bishops and the pope was relatively increased. See archbishop and primate.

By consent of all churches, . . . the precedency in each province was assigned to the Bishop of the Metropolis, who was called the first Bishop, the Metropolitan.
Barrow, The Pope's Supremacy.

The bishops [of Cyprus] were . . . subjected to the Latin metropolitan, who was bound to administer justice among them. Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 167.

(b) In modern usage, in the Roman Catholic and other episcopal churches, any archbishop who has bishops under his authority.

These be. lo, the verye prelates and bysshoppes metropolitanes and postles of theyr sects.
Sir T. More, Works, p. 1091.

The archbishops of Canterbury and York are both metropolitans. Hook.

An Oath of obedience to the metropolitan . . . was added to the Oath of Supremacy.
R. W. Dixon, Hist. Church of Eng., xvi.

(c) In the Greek Church, the bishop of the municipal capital of a province, who is in rank intermediate between a patriarch and a bishop or titular archbishop.

At length the gilded portals of the sanctuary are reopened, and the Metropolitan, attended by the deacons, comes forward, carrying the Holy Eucharist.
Harper's Mag., LXXIX. 197.

3†. A chief city; a metropolis.

It [Amiens] is . . . the metropolitan of Picardy.
Coryat, Crudities, I. 15.

metropolitanate (met-rō-pol'i-tan-āt), n. [< ML. metropolitanatus*, < LL. metropolitanus, a metropolitan: see metropolitan.] The office or see of a metropolitan bishop.

As his wife she [Heloisa] closed against him [Abelard] that ascending ladder of ecclesiastical honours, the priorate, the abbacy, the bishopric, the metropolitanate, the cardinalate, and even that which was beyond and above all.
Milman, Latin Christianity, viii. 5.

metropolitanism (met-rō-pol'i-tan-izm), n. The state of being a metropolis or great city.

Metrosidereæ (mē″trō-si-dē'rē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1865), < Metrosideros + -eæ.] A subtribe of plants of the family Myrtaceæ, the myrtle family, typified by the genus Metrosideros. It is characterized by many free stamens, arranged in one or many series, or connate in clusters, opposite the petals, myrtle-like or large and feather-veined leaves, and flowers almost always in corymbs or short racemes. It embraces 9 genera and about 68 species, which are found principally in Australia and New Caledonia. Metrosiderinæ of Engler and Prantl.

Metrosideros (mē″trō-si-dē'ros), n. [NL. (Banks, 1788), < Gr. μήτρα, the pith or heart of a tree, lit. womb, + σίδηρος, iron: see siderite.] A genus of plants of the family Myrtaceæ and the tribe Leptospermeæ, type of the subtribe Metrosidereæ. They are trees or shrubs, sometimes climbers — a few climbing when young, and independent when old. The ovules are arranged in many series, and horizontal or ascending; the leaves are opposite and feather-veined; the flowers are usually showy, prevailingly red, strongly marked by their crown of very numerous long erect stamens, and borne in dense terminal three-forked cymes. There are about 20 species, growing chiefly in the Pacific islands, from New Zealand to the Sandwich Islands, one species each in tropical Australia and South Africa. M. vera is the iron-tree of Java, and M. robusta the rata of New Zealand. Various species are known in cultivation. Eight fossil species of this genus have been described, chiefly from the European Tertiary, but one occurs in the Middle Cretaceous of Greenland.

Ironwood (Metrosideros vera).

metrotome (mē'trō-tōm), n. [< Gr. μήτρα, womb, + τομός, cutting, < τέμνειν, ταμεῖν, cut.] In surg., an instrument used to incise the uterus; a hysterotome.

Metroxylon (mē-trok'si-lon), n. [NL. (Rottböll, 1783), < Gr. μήτρα, the pith or heart of a tree, + ξύλον, wood.] A genus of palms, known to older writers as Sagus, type of the tribe Metroxyleæ and falling within the subtribe Calameæ. They bear fruit but once, and are characterized by robust stems and branching spikes. They are large trees with terminal suberect pinnately cut leaves having opposite linear-lanceolate segments; the spadix has a coriaceous prickly spathe. Five species are known, indigenous in the Malay archipelago and New Guinea. M. lævis and M. Rumphii, natives of Siam, the Malayan islands, etc., are the proper sago-palms. The former grows from 25 to 50 feet high, and has a rather thick trunk, covered with leaf-scars, which bears a graceful crown of large pinnate leaves, from the center of which arise the pyramidal flower-spikes. The latter is a much smaller tree, further distinguished by the sharp spines borne on its leaves and flower-sheaths. These trees flower when about fifteen years old, and require nearly three years to ripen their fruit, after which they die. (See sago.) M. Rumphii is a littoral tree which forms dense growths; M. lævis grows in swamps. Cœlococcus Carolinensis, which yields seeds that serve as a vegetable ivory, has been referred to this genus.

mettadel†, n. [< It. metadella, a liquid measure.] A measure of wine, containing one quart and nearly half a pint, two of which make a flask. Bailey, 1731.

Mezentian (mē-zen'shian), a. [< Mezentius (see def.) + -an.] Relating to Mezentius, a mythical Etruscan king, noted for his cruelty, alleged to have formed an alliance with the Rutulians.

Spared from the curse of the imperial system and the Mezentian union with Italy, . . . it [England] developed its own common laws. Stubbs, Const. Hist., I. 6.

mezereon (mē-zē'rē-on), n. [< F. mézéréon = Sp. mezereon, < Ar. and Pers. māzariyūn, the camellia.] An Old World shrub, Daphne Mezereum. See cut under Daphne.—Mezereon bark. See bark[2].

mezereum (mē-zē'rē-um), n. [NL.: see mezereon.] Same as mezereon.

mezquite, n. See mesquit[2].

mezuzah (me-zö'zä), n.; pl. mezuzoth (-zoth). [Heb.] Among the Jews, an emblem consisting of a piece of parchment, inscribed on one side with the words found in Deut. vi. 4–9 and xi. 13–21, on the other with "Shaddai," 'the Almighty,' and so placed in a small hollow cylinder that the divine name is visible through an opening covered by a glass. This cylinder is affixed to the right-hand door-post in Jewish houses. The Jews believed that the mezuzah had the virtue of an amulet in protecting a house from disease and evil spirits.

Every pious Jew, as often as he passes the mezuzah, in leaving the house or in entering it, touches the divine name with the finger of his right hand, puts it to his mouth, and kisses it, saying in Hebrew "The Lord shall preserve thy going out and thy coming in from this time forth, and even for evermore" (Ps. cxxi. 8).
McClintock and Strong, Cyc.

mezza, a. See mezzo.

mezza-majolica (med″zä-mä-jol'i-kä), n. Early Italian pottery of decorative character similar to that of true majolica, but less ornamental.

Mezza-majolica.—Italian, 17th century.

(a) Pottery painted and glazed with lead, but without enamel. (b) Pottery having the enamel and richly painted, but without metallic luster.

mezzanine (mez'a-nin), n. [< F. mezzanine, < It. mezzanino, < mezzo, middle: see mezzo.] In arch.: (a) A story of diminished height introduced between two higher stories; an entresol. See cut under entresol. (b) A window less in height than in breadth; a window in an entresol.

mezzo (med'zō), a.; fem. mezza (med'zä). [It., < L. medius, middle: see mid[1], medium.] In music, middle; half; mean; moderate. Abbreviated M.—Mezza manica, a half-shift in violin-playing.—Mezza orchestra, with but half the instruments of an orchestra.—Mezza voce, with but half the voice; not loud.—Mezzo forte, moderately loud. Abbreviated mf.—Mezzo piano, moderately soft. Abbreviated mp.—Mezzo punto. Same as Gueuse lace (which see, under lace).—Mezzo-soprano, a voice or a voice-part of a compass between those of the soprano and the alto; a low soprano, especially one with a larger, deeper natural quality than a true soprano.—Mezzo-soprano clef, a C clef when placed on the second line of the staff.—Mezzo staccato, moderately or half staccato.—Mezzo-tenore, a voice or a voice-part of a compass between those of the tenor and the bass; a low tenor: more usually called a barytone, though the latter is rather a high bass than a low tenor.

mezzo-rilievo (med″zō-rē-lyā'vō), n. [It., < mezzo, middle, half, + rilievo, relief: see relief.] 1. In sculp., relief higher than bas-relief but lower than alto-rilievo; middle relief.—2. A piece of sculpture in such relief.

mezzotint (mez'ō- or med'zō-tint), n. [< It. mezzotinto, < mezzo, middle, half, + tinto (< L. tinctus), painted, pp. of tingere, paint: see tint, tinge.] A method of engraving on copper or steel of which the essential feature is the burnishing and scraping away, to a variable extent, of a uniformly roughened surface consisting of minute incisions, accompanied by a bur, produced by an instrument called a cradle or rocker. This surface is left nearly undisturbed in the deepest shadows of the subject, but is partially removed in the middle tints, and completely in the highest lights. Thus treated, the plate, when inked, prints impressions graded in light and shade according to the requirements of the design, from a rich velvety and perfectly uniform black up through every variation of tone to brilliant white, or showing, when desirable, the sharpest contrasts between the extremes. This style of engraving, invented by Van Siegen, a Dutchman, in 1643, though erroneously ascribed to his pupil Prince Rupert, has been pursued with most success in England. The defect of the process is that it does not admit of clear and sharp delineation of forms; hence in modern practice the outline of the design is strongly etched with acid before the cradle is used, and texture is often given to the finished plate by lines produced by dry-point etching.

This afternoon Prince Rupert shew'd me with his owne hands ye new way of graving call'd Mezzo Tinto.
Evelyn, Diary, March 13, 1661.

Mezzotint print, in photog., a picture having some resemblance in texture, finish, or effect to a mezzotint engraving. See the quotation.

Others modify the effects and soften their paper prints by interposing a sheet of glass, of gelatin, of mica, or of tissue paper between the negative and the paper; in this way are made the so-called Mezzotint Prints.
Lea, Photography, p. 194.

mezzotint (mez'ō- or med'zō-tint), v. t. [< mezzotint, n.] To engrave in mezzotint; represent in or as if in mezzotint.

How many times I had lingered to study the shadows of the leaves mezzotinted upon the turf.
Lowell, Study Windows, p. 54.

Painted by Kneller in 1716, and mezzotinted a year later by Smith. Scribner's Mag., III. 542.

mezzotinter (mez'ō- or med'zō-tin-tėr), n. An artist who works in mezzotint; an engraver of mezzotints.

1700. Mr. John Smith; The best mezzotinter, . . . who united softness with strength, and finishing with freedom.
Walpole, Catalogue of Engravers, V. 202.

mezzotinto (med-zō-tin'tō), n. and v. Same as ★mezzotint.

mf. In music, the abbreviation of mezzo forte.

M. F. H. An abbreviation of Master of Foxhounds.

M. ft. [Abbr. of L. mistura fiat: mistura, mixture; fiat, 3d pers. sing. subj. pres. of fieri, be done: see fiat.] In phar., let a mixture be made: used in medical prescriptions.

Mg. In chem., the symbol for magnesium.

M. G. (a) An abbreviation of Major-General. ★(b) In musical notation, an abbreviation of the French main gauche (left hand), indicating that a note or passage is to be played with the left ★hand.

Mgr. An abbreviation of Monsignor or of Monseigneur.

M. H. G. An abbreviation of Middle High German. In the etymologies in this work it is written more briefly MHG.

mho (mō), n. [ohm reversed.] A term proposed by Sir W. Thomson (Lord Kelvin) for the unit of electrical conductivity; the conductivity of a body whose resistance is one ohm.

mhometer (mom'e-tėr), n. [< mho + Gr. μέτρον, measure.] An instrument for measuring electrical conductivities.

mi (mē), n. [It., etc., orig. taken from the first syllable of L. mira: see gamut.] In solmization, the syllable used for the third tone of the scale. In the scale of C this tone is E, which is therefore sometimes called mi in France, Italy, etc. —Mi contra fa, in medieval music, the interval of the tritone, "the devil in music": so named because it occurred between mi (B) of the "hard" hexachord and fa (F) of the "natural" hexachord: see hexachord and tritone. Also called si contra fa.

miana-bug (mi-ä'nä-bug), n. [< Miana, a town in Persia, + bug[2].] A kind of tick, Argas persicus, of the family Ixodidæ, whose bite is very painful and said to be even fatal. See Argas.

miaouli (mi-ou'li), n. [Dyak maias.] The volatile oil of Melaleuca Leucadendron. It closely resembles cajeput-oil.

miargyrite (mī-är'ji-rīt), n. [< Gr. μείων, less, + ἀργυρος, silver, + -ite[2].] In mineral., a sulphid of antimony and silver, occurring in monoclinic crystals of an iron-black color with dark cherry-red streak.

miarolitic (mi-ar-ō-lit'ik), a. [< Local Italian miarola.] In petrog., a term proposed by Rosenbusch for a drusy or cavernous texture often found in granular igneous rocks. The cavities are small and of angular shape, and mineral grains projecting into them exhibit crystal faces. It is believed that these miarolitic spaces represent the shrinkage a molten magma undergoes on crystallization into a granular rock. The texture is well illustrated in granite near Baveno, Italy.

mias (mī'as), n. [Dyak maias.] A native name of the orang-outang. The natives distinguish three kinds, mias-kassar, mias-rombi, and mias-chappin, which are, however, merely the same species at different ages, mias-chappin being the old males.

miaskite, miascite (mi-as'kīt), n. [< Miask, in Siberia, where the rock is found, + -ite[2].] A variety of elæolite-syenite.

miasm (mī'azm), n. [< F. miasme = Sp. Pg. It. miasma, < NL. miasma, < Gr. μίασμα, stain, pollution (cf. μιασμός, stain), < μιαίνειν, stain, dye, taint, pollute.] Same as miasma.

The plague is a malignant fever, caused through pestilential miasms insinuating into the humoral and consistent parts of the body. Harvey, Consumptions.

miasma (mī-az'mä), n.; pl. miasmata (-ma-tä). [NL.: see miasm.] Noxious exhalations from putrescent matter; the emanations or effluvia arising from the ground and floating in the atmosphere, considered to be injurious to health; noxious emanations. Also called aërial poison.

miasmal (mī-az'mal), a. [< miasm + -al.] Containing miasma; miasmatic: as, miasmal swamps.

miasmatic (mī-az-mat'ik), a. [= F. miasmatique = Sp. miasmático = Pg. It. miasmatico, < NL. miasma(t-): see miasm.] Pertaining to or of the nature of miasma; affected, caused by, or arising from noxious effluvia; malarious. as, miasmatic exhalations; miasmatic diseases; a miasmatic region.—Miasmatic fever. See fever[1].

miasmatical (mī-az-mat'i-kal), a. [< miasmatic + -al.] Same as miasmatic.

miasmatist (mī-az'ma-tist), n. [< miasma(t-) + -ist.] One who is versed in the phenomena and nature of noxious exhalations; one who makes a special study of diseases arising from miasmata.

miasmatous (mī-az'ma-tus), a. [< miasma(t-) + -ous.] Generating miasma: as, stagnant and miasmatous pools.

miasmology (mī-az-mol'ō-ji), n. [< Gr. μίασμα (see miasm) + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] A treatise on miasma; the science that treats of miasmata. Imp. Dict.

miasmous (mī-az'mus), a. [< miasma + -ous.] Miasmal; miasmatic.

The maremma, where swamps and woods cover cities and fields, and some herds of wild cattle and their half savage keepers are the only occupants of a fertile but miasmous desert.
J. P. Mahaffy, Harper's Mag., LXVIII. 902.

Miastor (mī-as't.r), n. [NL., < Gr. μιάστωρ, a guilty wretch, also an avenger, < μιαίνειν, stain, defile, pass. incur defilement. see miasm.] A remarkable genus of nemocerous dipterous insects of the family Cecidomyiidæ, having moniliform eleven-jointed antennæ, short two-jointed palpi, and the wings with three veins, the middle one of which does not reach the apex. M. metroloas is an example. This species reproduces agamically. The larvæ, which are found under bark, develop within themselves other similar larvæ, which again reproduce themselves, until this chain of asexual reproduction ends by the passing of the larva to the pupa state, from which sexual individuals arise to pair and lay eggs for a fresh generation in the usual way. Meinert, 1864.

miau, miaw (miou, miä), v. i. Variant forms of mew[2]. Minsheu.

miaul (mi-âl'), v. i. [= F. miauler: see mewl.] To cry as a cat; mew.

I mind a squalling woman no more than a miauling kitten. Scott.

There was a cat trying to get at the pigeons in the coop. It clawed and miauled at the lattice-work of lath.
Howells, Annie Kilburn, xxix.

mica[1]† (mī'kä), n. [= OF. (and F.) mie = It. mica, < L. mica, a crumb, grain, little bit. Hence ult. miche[3] and mie: see mie.] A crumb; ★a little bit. E. Phillips, 1706.

mica[2] (mī'kä), n. [= F mica = Sp. Pg. mica, a mineral, < NL. mica, a glittering mineral (see def.), < L. mica, a crumb (cf. mica[1]), prob. applied to the mineral on the supposition that it was related to L. micare, shine, glitter.] 1. One of a group of minerals all of which are characterized by their very perfect basal cleavage, in consequence of which they can be separated easily into extremely thin, tough, and usually elastic laminæ. They occur in crystals with a prismatic angle of 120°, but more commonly in crystalline aggregates, often of large plates, but sometimes of minute scales having a foliated structure, the folia being generally parallel, but also concentric, wavy, and interwoven, and also arranged in stellate or plumose and sometimes almost fibrous forms. In crystallization the micas belong to the monoclinic system, but they approximate very closely in form in part to the orthorhombic system (e. g., muscovite), in part to the rhombohedral system (e. g., biotite). The micas are silicates of aluminium with other bases, a iron, calcium, magnesium, potassium, sodium, lithium; in some kinds fluorin is present in small amount. The prominent varieties are—muscovite or common potash mica, the light-colored mica of granite and similar rocks, and paragonite, which is an analogous soda species; biotite, or magnesia mica (including meroxene and anomite, distinguished according to the position of the optic axial plane), the black or dark-green mica of granite, hornblende rocks, etc.; phlogopite, the bronze-colored species common in crystalline limestone and serpentine rocks; lepidomelane, a black mica containing a large amount of iron; and lepidolite, the rose-red or lilac lithia mica occurring commonly in aggregates of scales. (See further under these names.) The micas enter into the composition of many rocks, including the crystalline rocks, both metamorphic and volcanic (as granite, gneiss, mica-schist, trachyte diorite, etc.), and sedimentary rocks (as shales and sandstones), sometimes giving them a laminated structure. In the sedimentary rocks they are in most cases derived from the disintegration of older crystalline rocks. Mica (muscovite) is often used in thin transparent plates for spectacles to protect the eyes in various mechanical processes, in reflectors, instead of glass in places exposed to heat, as in head-lights and stove- and lantern-lights, and even for windows in Russia (hence called Muscovy glass). Ground to powder, it is combined with varnish to make a glittering coating for wall-papers, and is used also in preparing a covering for roofs, and as a packing and lubricator for machinery. It is often vulgarly called isinglass. The so-called brittle micas include a number of species, as margarite, seybertite (clintonite), etc., which are related to the true micas, but are characterized by their brittle folia. 2. In the preparation of kaolin for use in the manufacture of porcelain, one of the second set of channels through which a mixture of water and suspended clay washed out by the water from the broken clay-bearing rock is slowly passed to obtain the deposition of flakes of mica and other foreign substances, and thus to purify the clay, which is finally allowed to subside in a series of pits or tanks. Each of the first set of channels through which the mixture is passed for the settling of the coarser flakes of mica, etc., is called a drag. This set of channels is collectively called the drags, and the second set the micas. See porcelain and kaolin.—Copper mica. Same as chalcophyllite.—Lithia mica. Same as lepidolite.—Mica-powder, giant-powder in which mica in fine scales takes the place of the silicious earth. Eissler, Mod. High Explosives, p. 353.

mica-. A prefix frequently used in lithology when the rock in question contains more or less mica in addition to the other usual constituents. Thus, mica-syenite, a rock differing very little from ordinary syenite; mica-trap, nearly the same as minette, etc.

micaceocalcareous (mī-kā"sē-ō-kal-kā'rē-us), a. [< micaceous + calcareous.] In geol., containing mica and lime specifically noting a mica-schist containing carbonate of lime.

micaceous (mī-kā'shius), a. [= F. micacé = Sp. micáceo = Pg. It. micaceo, < NL. micaceus*, < mica, mica: see mica[2].] 1. Pertaining to or containing mica; resembling mica or partaking of its properties, especially that of occurring in foliated masses consisting of separable laminæ: as, micaceous structure.—2. See micacious, in the supplement.

There is the Cyclopean stile of which Johnson is the great example, the sparkling or micacious possessed by Hazlitt. Southey, The Doctor, interchapter xxii.

Micaceous iron ore. See iron.—Micaceous rocks, rocks of which mica is the chief ingredient, as mica-schist and phyllite.—Micaceous schist, mica-schist.

Micaria (mī-kā'ri-ä), n. Same as Macaria.

mica-schist (mī'kä-shist'), n. A rock made up of quartz and mica, with a more or less schistose or slaty structure. The relative proportion of the two minerals differs often very considerably even in the same mass of rock. The usual mica in a typical mica-schist is the species called muscovite; this, however, is sometimes replaced to a certain extent by biotite or paragonite. Mica-schist results from the dynamic metamorphism of certain igneous or sedimentary rocks through great pressure accompanied by recrystallization of constituents. It is one of the most abundantly distributed of the so-called crystalline or metamorphic rocks, and, with granite, gneiss, and the other schists, forms the main body of the rocks formerly designated as primitive.

mica-slate (mī'kä-slāt'), n. The common name of the rock now usually designated by lithologists as phyllite.

mice, n. Plural of mouse.

mice-eyed† (mīs'īd), a. Keen-eyed; sharp-sighted.

A legion of mice-eyed decipherers.
Nashe, Lenten Stuffe (Harl. Misc., VI. 177). (Davies.)

micella (mi-sel'ä), n.; pl. micellæ (-ē). [NL., dim. of L. mica, a crumb, grain: see mica[1].] One of the hypothetical crystalloid bodies or plates supposed by Nägeli to be the units out of which organized bodies, more particularly plants, are built up. These micellæ were supposed to be aggregates of larger or smaller numbers of chemical molecules, and were determined by the optical properties exhibited by cell-walls, starch-grains, and various proteid crystalloids. From their optical properties it was concluded further that they were biaxial crystals, and they were assigned, as a probable form, that of parallelepipedal prisms with rectangular or rhomboid bases.

Crystalline doubly refracting particles or micellæ, each consisting of numerous atoms and impermeable by water.
Encyc. Brit., XII. 12.

micellar (mi-sel'är), a. [< micella + -ar[3].] Pertaining or relating to micellæ.

★Naegeli's micellar hypothesis. Science, VIII. 571.

Mich. An abbreviation of Michaelmas.

michaelite (mī'kel-it), n. [< Michael (St. Michael's, an island of the Azores, where it is found) + -ite[2].] In mineral., a white, pearly, fibrous variety of opal.

Michaelmas (mik'el-mas), n. [< ME. Michelmesse, Mychelmesse, Mihelmas, Mihelmasse, Myhelmasse, < Michel (< F. Michel, < Heb. Mikhā'ēl, a proper name, signifying 'who is like God'?)

+ masse, messe, mass: see mass[1].] 1. A festival celebrated by the Roman Catholic Church, the Anglican, and some other churches on September 29th, in honor of the archangel Michael. The festival is called in full the Festival or Feast of St. Michael and All Angels. It appears to have originated in a local celebration or celebrations, and seems to have already existed in the fifth century. The Greek Church dedicates November 8th to St. Michael, St. Gabriel, and All Angels; the Armenian and Coptic churches also observe this day.

For lordes and lorelles luthere and goode,
Fro Myhel-masse to Myhel-masse ich fynde mete and drynke.
Piers Plowman (C), xvi. 215.

2. September the 29th as one of the four quarter-days in England on which rents are paid.

And when the tenants come to pay their quarter's rent,
They bring some fowl at Midsummer, a dish of fish in Lent,
At Christmas a capon, at Michaelmas a goose.
Gascoigne (1575), quoted in Chambers's Book of Days, II. 390.

All this, though perchance you read it not till Michaelmas, was told you at Micham, 15th August, 1607.

Michelangelesque (mī-kel-an-jel-esk'), a. [< Michelangelo (see def.) + -esque.] Pertaining to Michelangelo Buonarroti (1475–1564), a famous Italian sculptor, painter, and architect; resembling the style of Michelangelo, or belonging to his school.

Michelangelism (mī-kel-an'jel-izm), n. [< Michelangelo (see def.) + -ism.] The manner or tendencies in art of Michelangelo Buonarroti. See Michelangelesque.

It shuns the Scylla of nullity and bad taste only to fall into the Charybdis of Michelangelism.
C. C. Perkins, Italian Sculpture, p. 350.

Michelia (mī-kē'li-ä), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), named after Micheli, a Florentine botanist of the early part of the 18th century.] A genus of plants of the family Magnoliaceæ and the tribe Magnolieæ, characterized by introrse anthers, by having the cluster of pistils raised on a stalk, and by the many-seeded carpels. They are trees having much the appearance of magnolias, but with the flowers usually smaller and (with one exception) axillary, whereas magnolia-flowers are terminal. About 15 species are known, natives of tropical and mountainous Asia. The most noteworthy species are M. excelsa, the champ, and M. champaca, the champak, both valuable economically, the latter a sacred tree in India.

michellevyite (mē-shel-lev'i-īt), n. [Named after M. Michel Lévy, a French mineralogist.] A mineral supposed by the describer to be a monoclinic form of barium sulphate, but later shown to be only a massive barite owing its peculiarities of cleavage and twinning lamellæ to the pressure of the inclosing rock. It occurs in a crystalline limestone near Perkins' Mill, Templeton, Province of Quebec, Canada.

micher†, n. [Also meecher, meacher; < ME. mycher, mecher; < miche[1] + -er[1].] One who skulks or sneaks; a truant; a mean thief.

The Wee Wee Man (Child's Ballads, I. 126).

O mickle is the powerful grace that lies
In herbs, plants, stones, and their true qualities.
Shak., R. and J., ii. 3. 15.

2. Much; abundant.

O cruell Boy, alas, how mickle gall Thy baenfull shaft mingles thy Mell withall!
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Magnificence.

There was never sae meikle siller clinked in his purse either before or since. Scott, Waverley, xviii.

Let me laugh awhile, I've mickle time to grieve.
Keats, Eve of St. Agnes, xiv.

II. n. 1†. Size; magnitude; bigness.

A wonder wel-farynge knyght, . . .
Of good mochel, and ryght yonge therto.
Chaucer, Death of Blanche, l. 454.

2. A great deal; a large quantity: as, many littles make a mickle.

mickle†, v. t. [< ME. mikelen, muclen, muclien, also assibilated muchelen, < AS. micelian, miclian, micclian, also gemiclian (= OHG. mihhilōn = Icel. mikla = Goth. mikiljan), become great, make great, magnify, < micel, great: see mickle, a. Cf. much, v.] To magnify.

mickleness† (mik'l-nes), n. [< ME. mekilnesse, < AS. micelnes, mycelnes, < micel, great: see mickle and -ness.] Bigness; great size.

After this ther com apone thame thane a grete multitude of swyne, that ware alle of a wonderfulle mekilnesse, with tuskes of a cubett lenthe.
MS. Lincoln A. i. 17, f. 28. (Halliwell.)

micky (mik'i), n.; pl. mickies (-iz). [A dim. of Mike, a familiar abbreviation of Michael, a favorite name among Irishmen, from that of St. Michael. Cf. Pat, Paddy, similarly derived from the name of St. Patrick.] 1. An Irishman. [Slang, U. S.]— 2. A young wild bull. [Australian.]

There were two or three Mickies and wild heifers, who determined to have their owner's heart's blood.
A. C. Grant, Bush-life in Queensland, I. 227.

mico (mē'kō), n. [S. Amer.] 1. A small squirrel-like monkey of South America, one of the marmosets or oustitis, of the genus Hapale or Jacchus. H. argentatus is white, with black tail and flesh-colored face and hands.— 2. [cap.] A genus of marmosets based on this species.

Miconia (mī-kō'ni-ä), n. [NL. (Ruiz and Pavon, 1794), named after D. Micon, a Spanish botanist.] A large genus of South American plants of the family Melastomaceæ and type of the tribe Miconieæ. It is characterized by terminal inflorescence, 4- or 8-parted flowers with obtuse petals, and a calyx which has a cylindrical tube and usually a 4- to 8-lobed limb. They are trees or shrubs, with very variable foliage, and white, rose-colored, purple, or yellowish flowers, which are small, and grow in terminal or very rarely lateral clusters. About 550 species have been enumerated, all confined to tropical America. Quite a number are cultivated for ornament. They sometimes receive the name of West Indian currant-bush.

Miconieæ (mī-kō-nī'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1828), < Miconia + -eæ.] A tribe of new world plants, belonging to the family Melastomaceæ, typified by the genus Miconia. It is characterized by a berry-like or coriaceous fruit, which breaks open irregularly; by the leaves not being grooved between the primary nerves; and by the anthers opening by one or two pores or slits, with the connective usually having no appendages. The tribe includes 25 genera and over 1100 species, all of which are indigenous to tropical America.

micostalis (mī-kos-tā'lis), n.; pl. micostales (-lēz). [NL. (Wilder and Gage), < F. micostal (Straus-Durckheim), supposed to stand for microcostal, < Gr. μικρός, small, + L. costa, rib: see costal.] A muscle of the fore leg of some animals, as the cat, corresponding to the human teres minor.

micrander (mik-ran'dėr), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + ἀνήρ (ἀνδρ-), male.] A dwarf male plant produced by algæ belonging to the Œdogoniaceæ. The androspores, which are peculiar zoöspores produced non-sexually in special cells of the parent plant, fix themselves (after swarming) upon the female plant and produce these very small male plants.

Micrastur (mik-ras'tėr), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + LL. astur, a species of hawk: see Astur.] A genus of hawks of the family Falconidæ and subfamily Accipitrinæ, established by G. R. Gray in 1841, having the tarsus reticulated behind and the nostrils circular with a centric tubercle. It is peculiar to America, the species ranging from southern Mexico to Bolivia and Peru.

Micrathene (mik-ra-thē'nē), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + Ἀθήνη, Athene: see Athene.] A genus of Strigidæ established by Coues in 1866; the elf-owls. It includes the most diminutive of owls, with small weak bill and feet, relatively long rounded wings, square tail with broad rectrices, tarsi feathered only above, the feet elsewhere covered with bristles, and middle toe with claw as long as the tarsus. The type and only species is M. whitneyi, an insectivorous owl of arboreal habits, found in the southwestern United States and parts of Mexico. It is only about six inches long. Also called Micropallas.

micraulic (mik-râ'lik), a. [< NL. micraulicus, < Gr. μικρός, small, + NL. aula, aula: see aula, 2.] Having the aula small; specifically, of or pertaining to micraulica.

micraulica (mik-râ'li-kä), n. pl. [NL.: see micraulic.] Animals whose aula is small and whose cerebral hemispheres are vertically expanded. They are amphibians, dipnoans, reptiles, birds, and mammals. Wilder, Amer. Nat., Oct., 1887, p. 914.

Micrembryeæ (mik-rem-brī'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1880), < Gr. μικρός, small, + ἔμβρυον, a germ: see embryo.] A series of dicotyledonous apetalous plants. It is characterized by an ovary consisting of a single carpel or of several united or distinct carpels, by the ovules being solitary or rarely several in each carpel, and by the seed having copious fleshy or starchy albumen and a very small embryo. It included 4 families (Piperaceæ, Chloranthaceæ, Myristicaceæ, and Monimiaceæ), 39 genera, and nearly 1,300 species. Not now considered a natural group.

micrencephalous (mik-ren-sef'a-lus), a. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + ἐγκέφαλος, the brain.] Small-brained; having a small brain.

micristology (mik-ris-tol'ō-ji), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. histology.] The science which treats of the minutest organic fibers. Thomas, Med. Dict.

micro (mī'krō), n. [< micro-, as used in Microcoleoptera, etc.] In entom., any small insect. Thus, Microcoleoptera are small beetles, Microdiptera are small flies, etc.; and in familiar language, when the meaning is sufficiently determined by the connection, such words are abbreviated to micro. When not so determined micro always means one of the Microlepidoptera.

micro- (usually mī'krō, but also, better, mik'rō). [L., etc., micro-, < Gr. μικρός, also σμικρός, small, little.] An element of Greek origin, meaning 'small, little'; specifically, in physics, a prefix indicating a unit one millionth part of the unit it is prefixed to: as, *micro*farad, *micro*ohm, etc.;

in lithol., indicating that the structure designated is microscopic in character, or that it is so minutely developed as not to be recognized without the help of the microscope, e. g. micrograniticmicropegmatitic, micrograniulitic. See these words.

micro-audiphone (mī-krō-â′di-fōn), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. audiphone.] An instrument for reinforcing or augmenting very feeble sounds so as to render them audible.

Microbacterium (mī″krō-bak-tē′ri-um), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + βακτήριον, a little stick: see bacterium.] In some systems of classification, a tribe or division of Schizomycetes, containing the single genus Bacterium, and characterized by having elliptical or short cylindrical cells.

microbal (mī′krō-bal), a. Same as microbial.

But now we have antisepsis of the track and careful covering of the wound to guard against microbal invasion.
Medical News, LII. 506.

microbe (mī′krōb), n. [< F. microbe (C. Sedillot, 1878) (NL. microbion), intended to mean 'a small living being,' but according to the formation 'short-lived' (cf. Gr. μικρόβιος, short-lived), < Gr. μικρός, small, little, + βίος, life.] A minute living being not distinguished, primarily, as to its animal or vegetable nature.

Bacillus prodigiosus.

The term is most frequently applied to various microscopic plants or their spores (particularly Schizomycetes), and further has come to be almost synonymous with bacterium. Taken in this latter sense, microbes are very minute organisms of simple structure and very wide and general distribution. The differences between genera and species are difficult to determine. The species are separated chiefly by their appearance and behavior when grown on different nutrient media. Micrococcus, Spirochæte, Bacillus, Leptothrix, Bacterium, Vibrio, Spirillum, and Pseudomonas are the genera under which most of the forms are known. They are instrumental in the production of fermentation, decay, and many of the infectious diseases affecting man and the lower animals. See bacterium.

Bacterium of Chicken Cholera.

microbia, n. Plural of microbion.

microbial (mī-krō′bi-al), a. [< microbe (microbion) + -al.] Of or pertaining to microbes; caused by or due to microbes. Also microbal.

There is a considerable difference found in the microbial richness of the air in different places in the country.
Nineteenth Century, XXII. 244.

microbian (mī-krō′bi-an), a. [< microbe (microbion) + -an.] Microbial.

His definition of pellagra is therefore this: "a microbian malady, due to a poisoning produced by a pathogenic bacillus."
Lancet, No. 3449, p. 707.

microbic (mī-krō′bik), a. [< microbe + -ic.] Microbial.

The theory of the microbic causation of the disorder.
Medical News, LII. 376.

microbicide (mī-krō′bi-sīd), n. [< NL. microbion, microbe, + L. -cīda, a killer, < cædere, kill.] A substance that kills microbes.

Sulphur is well known as a powerful microbicide long recommended in pulmonary diseases.
Medical News, L. 366.

microbiological (mī-krō-bī-ō-loj′i-kal), a. [< microbiology + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to microbiology: as, microbiological research.

Microbiological study of the lochia.
Medical News, XLVIII. 147.

microbiologist (mī″krō-bī-ol′ō-jist), n. [< microbiology + -ist.] One who studies or is skilled in microbiology; one versed in the knowledge of minute organisms, as microbes.

Ideas which are just now very prominent in the minds of microbiologists.
Science, V. 73.

microbiology (mī″krō-bī-ol′ō-ji), n. [< NL. microbion, microbe, + Gr. -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The science of micro-organisms; the study of microbes.

There was great reason for creating in the Faculty of Sciences the chair of microbiology.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXIII. 341.

microbion (mī-krō′bi-on), n.; pl. microbia (-ä). [NL.: see microbe.] Same as microbe.

These [reports] . . . by no means demonstrate that the active principle of cholera resides in a microbion, or that the particular microbion has been discovered.
Science, IV. 145.

microcaltrops (mī-krō-kal′trops), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. caltrop.] A sponge-spicule of minute size, having the form of a caltrop. Also microcalthrops. W. J. Sollas, Encyc. Brit., XXII. 417.

Microcameræ (mī-krō-kam′ę-rē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + L. camera, chamber: see chamber.] 1. A subtribe of choristidan sponges having the chambers small: opposed to Macrocameræ. Lendenfeld, 1886.—2. A tribe of ceratose sponges with small spherical ciliated chambers and opaque ground-substance. Lendenfeld.

microcamerate (mī-krō-kam′ę-rāt), a. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + L. camera, chamber: see chamber.] Having small chambers; specifically, of or pertaining to the Microcameræ, in either sense.

Microcebus (mī-krō-sē′bus), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + κῆβος, a long-tailed monkey: see Cebus.] A genus of small prosimian quadrupeds of the family Lemuridæ and subfamily Galagininæ, containing such species as the pygmy lemur, M. smithi, and the mouse-lemur, M. murinus; the dwarf lemurs.

Microcentri (mī-krō-sen′trī), n. pl. [NL. (Thomson, 1876), < Gr. μικρός, small, + κέντρον, point, spur: see center[1].] One of two prime sections of the parasitic hymenopterous family Chalcididæ, containing the seven subfamilies which have the tarsi three- or four-jointed (usually four-jointed, rarely heteromerous), anterior tibiæ with a slender short straight spur, and antennæ usually few-jointed. They are nearly all of small size.

Microcephala (mī-krō-sef′a-lä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of microcephalus, < Gr. μικροκέφαλος, small-headed: see microcephalous.] In Latreille's system, the fifth section of brachelytrous pentamerous Coleoptera. They have no evident neck, the head being received in the thorax as far as the eyes; the thorax is trapeziform, widening from before backward; the body is comparatively little elongated: the mandibles are of moderate size; and the elytrum often covers more than half of the abdomen. The species live on flowers, fungi, and dung. Also Microcephali.

microcephalia (mī″krō-se-fā′li-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. μικροκέφαλος, small-headed: see microcephalous.] Same as microcephaly.

microcephalic (mī″krō-se-fal′ik or -sef′a-lik), a. [As microcephal-ous + -ic.] Having an unusually small cranium. Specifically—(a) In craniom., having a cranium smaller than 1,350 cubic centimeters (Flower), 1,130 (Thurnam). (b) In pathol., having an abnormally small head, producing idiocy more or less extreme.

microcephalism (mī-krō-sef′a-lizm), n. [< microcephaly + -ism.] A microcephalic condition.

microcephalous (mī-krō-sef′a-lus), a. [= F. microcéphale = Pg. microcephalo, < NL. microcephalus, < Gr. μικροκέφαλος, small-headed, < μικρός, small, + κεφαλή, head.] Having a small head. Specifically—(a) Having the skull abnormally small; microcephalic. (b) In zoöl., of or pertaining to the Microcephala.

Microcephalus (mī-krō-sef′a-lus), n. [NL., < Gr. μικροκέφαλος, small-headed: see microcephalous.] 1. In entom.: (a) A South American genus of caraboid beetles, with about 6 species, having securiform terminal joints of both maxillary and labial palpi. (b) A genus of nemocerous dipterous insects of the family Chironomidæ. Van der Wulp, 1873.—2. A genus of reptiles. Lesson.—3. [l. c.] In pathol.: (a) A microcephalic person. (b) Microcephaly.—4. [l. c.] In teratol., a monster with a small, imperfect head or cranium.

microcephaly (mī-krō-sef′a-li), n. [< NL. microcephalia, q. v.] The condition or character presented by a small or imperfectly developed head.

Microchæta (mī-krō-kē′tä), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + χαίτη, a mane: see chæta.] A genus of earthworms. M. rappi is a gigantic South African earthworm, four or five feet long, of greenish and reddish coloration. Beddard, 1886.

microcharacter (mī-krō-kar′ak-tėr), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + χαρακτήρ, character: see character.] A zoölogical character discernible only by microscopic, or minute, examination.

microchemical (mī-krō-kem′i-kal), a. [< Gr. μικρός, small, minute, + E. chemical.] Of or pertaining to microchemistry: as, microchemical reactions; microchemical experiments: distinguished from macrochemical.

Microchemical examination shows that it performs a complex function.
Huxley and Martin, Elementary Biology, p. 274.

microchemically (mī-krō-kem′i-kal-i), adv. By microchemical processes; by means of or in accordance with microchemistry.

microchemistry (mī-krō-kem′is-tri), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, minute, + E. chemistry.] Minute chemical investigation; chemical analysis or investigation applied to objects under the microscope.

Microchiroptera (mī″krō-kī-rop′tę-rä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + NL. Chiroptera, q. v.] A suborder of Chiroptera, including the insectivorous or animalivorous (rarely frugivorous or blood-sucking) bats. They have a simple stomach (except Desmodontes); a large Spigelian and generally small caudate lobe of the liver; the tail contained in the interfemoral membrane when present, or freed from its upper surface; the rim of the ear incomplete at the base of the auricle; the index-finger rudimentary or wanting and without a claw; the palate not produced back of the molar teeth; and the molar teeth cuspidate. The group includes all bats except the family Pteropodidæ (which constitutes the suborder Megachiroptera), inhabiting most parts of the world, and falling into two large series, the vespertilionine alliance and the emballonurine alliance, the former of three families, the latter of two. Animalivora, Entomophaga, and Insectivora are synonyms of Microchiroptera.

microchiropteran (mī″krō-kī-rop′tę-ran), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Microchiroptera.

II. n. One of the Microchiroptera; any bat except a fruit-bat.

microchiropterous (mī″krō-kī-rop′tę-rus), a. Same as microchiropteran.

microchoanite (mī-krō-kō′a-nīt), a. and n. [< NL. Microchoanites.] I. a. Having short septal funnels, as a nautiloid; belonging to the Microchoanites.

II. n. A member of the Microchoanites.

Microchoanites (mī-krō-kō-a-nī′tēz), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + χοάνη, a funnel: see choana, choanite.] A group of ellipochoanoid nautiloid cephalopods whose septal funnels are short. Hyatt, Proc. Bost. Soc. Nat. Hist., 1883, p. 260.

microchronometer (mī″krō-krō-nom′e-tėr), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + χρόνος, time, + μέτρον, measure: see chronometer.] An instrument for registering very small periods of time, such as the time occupied by the passage of a projectile over a short distance: a kind of chronograph. Also called, corruptly, micronometer.

Microciona (mī-krō-sī′ō-nä), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + κίων (κιον-), a pillar.] A genus of fibrosilicious sponges of the division Echinonemata. M. prolifera is a common sponge on the Atlantic coast of the United States, growing in tide-pools in sheeted or branched masses of orange-red color.

microclastic (mī-krō-klas′tik), a. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + κλαστός, broken, < κλάν, break: see clastic.] An epithet applied to a clastic or fragmentary rock or breccia made up of pieces of small size. Naumann. [Rare.]

microcline (mī′krō-klīn), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + κλίνειν, incline: see cline, clinic.] A feldspar identical in composition with orthoclase, but belonging to the triclinic system. Thin sections often exhibit a peculiar grating-like structure in polarized light, due to double twinning. Much of the potash feldspar called orthoclase is really microcline, and the beautiful green feldspar called Amazon stone is here included. See feldspar and orthoclase.

Section of Microcline as seen in polarized light.

Micrococcus (mī-krō-kok′us), n. [NL. (Cohn, 1872), < Gr. μικρός, small, + κόκκος, a berry, kernel: see coccus.] 1. A genus of Schizomycetes (fission-fungi or bacteria), and the only one of the tribe Sphærobacteria. It is characterized by globular cells occurring singly or in groups of 2, 3, 4, or more. Division of the cells takes place in two directions. Spores are not known. All are destitute of spontaneous movement but exhibit a simple molecular tremor. Its species are sometimes divided into three physiological groups—chromogenes, producing coloring matter, as in "red milk" (M. Kefersteinii), or "golden yellow" (M. luteus); zymogenes, producing various fermentations, as in M. cerevisiæ, occurring in beer and producing lactic acid; and pathogenes, producing diseases. Malta fever, infectious bronchitis, septicemia, gonorrhea, and other diseases are believed to be produced by micrococci.

Micrococcus.

2. [l. c.; pl. micrococci (-sī).] Any member of this genus.

By the specific term micrococcus is understood a minute spherical or slightly oval organism (Sphærobacterium, Cohn), that like other bacteria divides by fission (Schizomycetes), and that does not possess any special organ, cilium or flagellum, by using which it would be capable of moving freely about.
E. Klein, Micro-Organisms and Disease, p. 37.

Microcoleoptera (mī-krō-kō-lē-op'tę-rą), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + NL. Coleoptera, q. v.] In entom., the smaller kinds of beetles collectively considered.

microconidium (mī″krō-kō-nid'i-um), n.; pl. microconidia (-ą). [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + NL. conidium.] A conidium of small size as compared with others produced in the same species.

Microconidia [of Hypomyces] or conidia proper very copious. Cooke, Handbook Brit. Fungi, p. 776.

microcosm (mī'krō-kozm), n. [< F. microcosme = Sp. microcósmos = Pg. It. microcosmo, < LL. microcosmus (Boëthius), < LGr. μικρόκοσμος, a little world, < Gr. μικρός, small, + κόσμος, world.] 1. A little world or cosmos; the world in miniature; something representing or assumed to represent the principle of universality: often applied to man regarded as an epitome, physically and morally, of the universe or great world (the macrocosm).

If you see this in the map of my microcosm, follows it that I am known well enough too? Shak., Cor., ii. 1. 68.

The ancients not improperly styled him [man] a microcosm, or little world within himself.
Bacon, Physical Fables, ii., Expl.

Some told me it [a mountain] was fourteene miles high; it is covered with a very microcosme of clowdes.
Coryat, Crudities, I. 91.

In the dark dissolving human heart,
And holy secrets of this microcosm, Dabbling a shameless hand with shameful jest.
Tennyson, Princess, iii.

Each particle is a microcosm, and faithfully renders the likeness of the world. Emerson, Discipline.

2. A little community or society.

And now the hour has come when this youth is to be launched into a world more vast than that in which he has hitherto sojourned, yet for which this microcosm has been no ill preparation. Disraeli.

microcosmic (mī-krō-koz'mik), a. [= F. microcosmique; as microcosm + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a microcosm or to anything that is regarded as such.—Microcosmic salt, $HNaNH_4PO_4 + 4H_2O$, a salt of soda, ammonia, and phosphoric acid, originally obtained from human urine. It is much employed as a flux in experiments with the blowpipe.

microcosmical (mī-krō-koz'mi-kal), a. [< microcosmic + -al.] Same as microcosmic. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 3. microcosmography (mī″krō-koz-mog'ra-fi), n. [< Gr. μικρόκοσμος, microcosm, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write. Cf. cosmography.] The description of man as a "little world."

microcosmology (mī″krō-koz-mol'ō-ji), n. [< Gr. μικρόκοσμος, microcosm, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] A treatise on the microcosm, specifically on the human body, or on man.

microcosmos (mī-krō-koz'mos), n. Same as microcosmus, 1.

microcosmus (mī-krō-koz'mus), n. [LL. (in defs. 2 and 3, NL.), < Gr. μικρόκοσμος, a little world: see microcosm.] 1. Same as microcosm, 1.—2. A tunicate, ascidian, or sea-squirt: applied by Linnæus in 1735, and recently revived by Heller as a generic name.—3. [cap.] A genus of coleopterous insects. Chaudoir, 1878.

microcoulomb (mī″krō-kö-lom'), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. coulomb.] One millionth of a coulomb. See coulomb.

microcoustic (mī-krō-kös'tik), a. and n. [Irreg. < Gr. μικρός, small, + ἀκουστικός, pertaining to hearing: see acoustic.] I. a. Serving to augment weak sounds; of or pertaining to an instrument for augmenting weak sounds.

II. n. An aural instrument designed to collect and augment small sounds, for the purpose of assisting the partially deaf in hearing.

microcrith (mī'krō-krith), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + κριθή, barley: see crith.] In chem., the unit of molecular weight, denoting the weight of the half-molecule of hydrogen.

microcrystalline (mī-krō-kris'ta-lin), a. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + κρυστάλλινος, crystalline: see crystalline.] Minutely crystalline: said of crystalline rocks of which the constituents are individually so minute that they cannot be distinguished from each other by the naked eye; cryptocrystalline. Many lithologists use microcrystalline and cryptocrystalline as synonymous. Rosenbusch, however, uses the former term to designate that structure of the ground-mass in which the constituent minerals can, with the aid of the microscope, be specifically determined, and the latter for a structure which can be recognized as crystalline, but in which the individual components cannot be specifically identified.

microcrystallitic (mī-krō-kris-ta-lit'ik), a. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + κρύσταλλος, crystal, + -ite^{2} + -ic.] A term used by Geikie to designate a devitrification product in which this process has been carried so far that little or no glass-base appears, the original glassy substance having become changed into an aggregation of crystallites or "little granules, needles, and hairs." See microfelsitic.

microcyst (mī'krō-sist), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + κύστις, the bladder, a bag, pouch.] In Myxomycetes, the resting state of swarm-spores, which become rounded off and invested with a delicate membrane, or sometimes only with a firm border, and may return again under favorable conditions to a state of movement. See Myxomycetes, swarm-spore.

microcyte (mī'krō-sīt), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + κύτος, a hollow, cavity: see cyte.] 1. A small cell or corpuscle.

The microcytes. Very small bodies, for the most part colourless, freely suspended in the plasma.
Huxley and Martin, Elementary Biology, p. 123.

2. A small blood-corpuscle, in size from 2 to 6 micromillimeters, found, often in large numbers, in many cases of anemia.

microcythemia (mī″krō-sī-thē'mi-ą), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + κύτος, a hollow (see microcyte), + αἷμα, blood.] That condition of the blood in which there are many corpuscles of diminished size.

microcytosis (mī″krō-sī-tō'sis), n. Microcythemia.

microdactylous (mī-krō-dak'ti-lus), a. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + δάκτυλος, finger: see dactyl.] Having short or small fingers or toes.

microdentism (mī-krō-den'tizm), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + L. den(t-)s, = E. tooth, + -ism.] Smallness of the teeth.

Microdentism — mere smallness of the teeth — was chronicled in fourteen of the hundred cases.
Lancet, No. 3432, p. 1152.

micro-detector (mī″krō-dē-tek'tor), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. detector.] A sensitive galvanoscope.

Microdiptera (mī-krō-dip'tę-rą), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + NL. Diptera.] In entom., the smaller kinds of flies collectively considered.

Microdon (mī'krō-don), n. [NL. (Meigen, 1803), < Gr. μικρός, small, + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] 1. In entom., an important genus of syrphid flies, containing a few European and about 20 North American species. They are large, nearly bare, usually short and thick-set, with flattened scutellum and short wings, in which there is a stump of a vein in the first posterior cell from the third longitudinal vein. The larvæ are remarkable objects, resembling shells, and have twice been described and named as mollusks. M. globosus is an example.

2. In ichth., a genus of pycnodont fishes of the Cretaceous period. Agassiz, 1833.—3. In conch., a genus of bivalve mollusks. Conrad, 1842.

microdont (mī'krō-dont), a. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] Having short or small teeth.

The microdont races are the low-caste natives of central and southern India; the Polynesians; the ancient Egyptians; mixed Europeans not British; and the British.
Science, IV. 538.

micro-electric (mī-krō-ē-lek'trik), a. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. electric.] Having electric properties in a very small degree.—Micro-electric metrology, the measurement of minute electric quantities.

microfarad (mī-krō-far'ad), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. farad.] The practical unit of electrical capacity, equal to the millionth part of a farad. It is the capacity of about three miles of an Atlantic cable.

microfelsite (mī-krō-fel'sīt), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. felsite.] A part of an igneous rock which is microfelsitic in texture under the microscope.

microfelsitic (mī″krō-fel-sit'ik), a. [< microfelsite + -ic.] The designation suggested by Zirkel for a devitrified glass when the devitrification has been carried so far that the hyaline character is lost, but not far enough to give rise to the development of distinctly individualized mineral forms. Other lithologists have used this word with different shades of meaning. Rosenbusch defines it as follows: "This substance, which is distinguished from micro- and crypto-crystalline aggregates by the absence of any action on polarized light, and from what may properly be called glass by not being entirely without structure and by being decidedly less transparent, I call microfelsite or the microfelsitic base."

microfoliation (mī-krō-fō-li-ā'shon), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. foliation.] Microscopic foliation, or that which is not distinctly recognized by the naked eye: a term used by Bonney in discussing the effect of pressure in Paleozoic sedimentary rocks. Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLIV. 44.

Microgadus (mī-krō-gā'dus), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + NL. Gadus, q. v.] A genus of Atlantic Tomcod, or Frost-fish (Microgadus tomcod).

(From Report of U. S. Fish Commission.)

small gadoid fishes, established by Gill in 1865; the tomcods. M. tomcod is a well-known species of the Atlantic coast of the United States; M. proximus is its representative on the Pacific coast.

Microgaster (mī-krō-gas'tėr), n. [NL. (Latreille, 1804), < Gr. μικρός, small, + γαστήρ, stomach: see gaster^{2}.] 1. A notable genus of parasitic hymenopters of the family Braconidæ, giving name to the subfamily Microgasterinæ. They are characterized by the three submarginal cells of the fore wings (the second one often incomplete), and by having the hind tibial spurs more than half the length of the tarsi. Many are known from Europe and North America, as M. subcompletus of the former country, which is parasitic on various lepidopterous larvæ.

2. [l. c.] A member of this genus.

Microgasterinæ (mī-krō-gas-tę-rī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Microgaster + -inæ.] A large subfamily of Braconidæ, typified by the genus Microgaster, having the mesonotal sutures invisible and the large marginal cell reaching to the end of the wing. There are many species, of 6 genera, the largest one of which, Apanteles, has 69 species in Great Britain alone. Their larvæ parasitize many insects, especially lepidopterous larvæ, issuing from the body of the host and spinning cocoons either singly or in mass. A. glomeratus is an abundant parasite of the cabbage-worm, Pieris rapæ, both in Europe and in North America.

microgeological (mī-krō-jē-ō-loj'i-kal), a. [< microgeology + -ic-al.] Pertaining to microgeology; dependent on or derived from the use of the microscope in relation to geology: as, microgeological investigations.

microgeology (mī″krō-jē-ol'ō-ji), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. geology.] That department of the science of geology whose facts are ascertained by the use of the microscope.

Microglossa (mī-krō-glos'ą), n. [NL., also Microglossus, Microglossum, < Gr. μικρός, small, + γλῶσσα, the tongue: see glossa.] In ornith., a genus of cockatoos of the family Cacatuidæ, established by Geoffroy in 1809. It contains the great black cockatoos, as M. aterrimum, goliath, and alecto, all inhabitants of New Guinea and other islands of the Papuan region.

microglossia (mī-krō-glos'i-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + γλῶσσα, the tongue: see glossa.] Congenital smallness of the tongue.

Microglossidæ (mī-krō-glos'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Microglossa + -idæ.] A family of psittacine birds, the black cockatoos: synonymous with Cacatuidæ.

Microglossinæ (mī″krō-glo-sī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Microglossa + -inæ.] A subfamily of Cacatuidæ, represented by the genus Microglossa, and containing the black cockatoos.

microgonidial (mī″krō-gō-nid'i-al), a. [< microgonidium + -al.] Of, pertaining to, or resembling a microgonidium.

microgonidium (mī″krō-gō-nid′i-um), n.; pl. microgonidia (-ä). [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + NL. gonidium.] A gonidium of small size as compared with certain others produced by the same species. Applied to both algæ and fungi.

The latter form [of Chlorococcum] is said to arise from the former by internal cell-division, which results in the production of "gonidia" of two sizes, the larger being termed macrogonidia, and the smaller microgonidia.
Bessey, Botany, p. 219.

★microgram (mī′krō-gram), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. *gram*².] The millionth part of a gram, being about $\frac{1}{70000}$ of a grain troy.

microgranite (mī-krō-gran′it), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. granite.] A granite of microcrystalline texture.

microgranitic (mī″krō-grā-nit′ik), a. [< microgranite + -ic.] Pertaining to microgranite.—Microgranitic structure. See quartz-porphyry.

microgranulitic (mī-krō-gran-ū-lit′ik), a. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. granulitic.] In lithol., an epithet applied by Lévy to a form of granitoid structure which is so finely crystallized that it cannot be recognized by the naked eye, but which, under the microscope, is revealed as being made up of crystalline individuals each having its own independent orientation, so that in polarized light it presents the appearance of a brilliantly colored mosaic. The microgranulitic structure, as this term is used by Lévy, differs from the micropegmatitic in the crystalline individuals of the latter having all one common orientation.

micrographer (mī-krog′ra-fėr), n. [< micrograph-y + *-er*¹.] One who is versed in micrography.

micrographic (mī-krō-graf′ik), a. [= F. micrographique; as micrography + -ic.] Of or pertaining to micrography.

micrographist (mī-krog′ra-fist), n. [< micrograph-y + -ist.] One who is skilled in micrography; a micrographer.

micrography (mī-krog′ra-fi), n. [= F. micrographie, < Gr. μικρός, small, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write. Cf. Gr. μικρογραφεῖν, 'write small,' i. e., with a short vowel.] 1. The description of objects too small to be discerned without the aid of a microscope.—2. Writing in very small or microscopic characters.

Microhierax (mī-krō-hī′e-raks), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + ἱέραξ, a hawk, falcon: see Hierax.] A genus of very small hawks of the family Falconidæ, established by R. B. Sharpe in 1874; the falconets; the finch-falcons. It contains the diminutive species usually referred to the genus Hierax, which name is preoccupied in another department of zoology. The range of the genus includes southern Asia, Java, Sumatra, Borneo, etc. There are several species, as M. cœrulescens, fringillarius, melanoleucus, and erythrogenys.

microhm (mik′rōm), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. ohm.] An electrical unit equal to the millionth part of an ohm.

microlepidopter (mī-krō-lep-i-dop′tėr), n. In entom., an insect of one of the families included in the Microlepidoptera.

Microlepidoptera (mī-krō-lep-i-dop′te-rä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + NL. Lepidoptera, q. v.] The smaller and more simply organized moths, including, generally, the smaller Pyralidæ, the Tortricidæ, the Tineidæ, and the Pterophoridæ. These insects do not constitute a natural division, and the name is merely used for convenience, the other members of the order being distinguished as Macrolepidoptera, or simply as Lepidoptera.

microlepidopteran (mī-krō-lep-i-dop′te-ran), a. and n. I. a. Microlepidopterous.
II. n. A microlepidopter.

microlepidopterist (mī-krō-lep-i-dop′te-rist), n. [< Microlepidoptera + -ist.] One who is versed in the natural history of Microlepidoptera.

microlepidopterous (mī-krō-lep-i-dop′te-rus), a. [< Microlepidoptera + -ous.] Of or pertaining to the microlepidopters.

Microlicia (mī-krō-lis′i-ä), n. [NL. (Don, 1823), so called as having the leaves usually small; < Gr. μικρός, small, + ὁλικός, universal, general, < ὅλος, all.] A genus of plants of the family Melastomaceæ and type of the tribe Microlicieæ, characterized by very unequal stamens with beaked or tube-bearing anthers, the connective elongated at the base, and by the calyx-lobes being shorter than the tube. They are erect branching undershrubs, usually not more than a foot or two high, with small leaves, which are generally glandular-dotted, and solitary, commonly rose-purple or white flowers, which are axillary or sometimes terminal. There are about 100 species, natives of Brazil, Guiana, and Peru. A few are sometimes found in greenhouses.

Microliciеæ (mī″krō-li-si′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Triana, 1865), < Microlicia + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the family Melastomaceæ and the subfamily Melastomeæ, characterized by the cylindrical or angular capsule, conical or convex at the apex, by the connective often being produced below the anther-cells, and by oblong or ovoid seeds. The tribe embraces 16 genera, Microlicia being the type, and about 280 species, all of which are found in tropical America.

microlite (mī′krō-līt), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + λίθος, stone: see -lite.] 1. A mineral related to pyrochlore, occurring in regular octahedrons having a brownish color and a resinous luster. It is essentially a niobate of calcium. It was first found at Chesterfield in Massachusetts, in minute crystals (whence the name), later in Virginia in larger crystals sometimes weighing several pounds.

2. Same as microlith: an incorrect use.

microliter (mī-krō-lē′tėr), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. liter.] The millionth part of a liter.

microlith (mī′krō-lith), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + λίθος, stone.] A name proposed by Vogelsang, in 1867, to designate the "microscopic acicular components of rocks"; a "microscopic individual" (Zirkel). The usage of later lithologists differs considerably in the application of this term. By some it is regarded as the equivalent of crystallite, which is properly an aggregation of microscopic globular forms (globulites). By others crystallites are considered as differing from microliths in that the latter have the internal structure of true crystals, while in the former this cannot be recognized. Elongated or lath-shaped forms and such as resemble an hour-glass in shape are those now most generally designated as microliths; if curved or more or less twisted or hair-like, they are frequently called trichites. Microliths are most frequently seen in rocks of igneous origin, and are especially abundant as primary forms of crystallization in glassy lavas. The feldspars, hornblende, augite, and apatite are minerals most commonly found assuming this form.

microlithic (mī-krō-lith′ik), a. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + λίθος, a stone, + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to or consisting of small stones: opposed to megalithic.

The cognate examples in the microlithic styles afford us very little assistance.
J. Fergusson, Rude Stone Monuments, p. 47.

2. In lithol., pertaining to or characterized by microliths.

microlitic (mī-krō-lit′ik), a. [< microlite + -ic.] Same as microlithic, 2.

micrological (mī-krō-loj′i-kal), a. [< *micrology*² + -ic-al.] Characterized by minuteness of investigation.

Of that equanimity, circumspection, patience of research, intellectual discipline, and equipment of micrological scholarship, without which it is given to no man to be a philologist, he has, unhappily, made the most penurious provision. F. Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 350.

micrologically (mī-krō-loj′i-kal-i), adv. In a micrological manner; by means of exact attention to minute details.

If things are to be scanned so micrologically.
Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 277, note.

micrology¹ (mī-krol′ō-ji), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology. Cf. *micrology*².] That part of science which is dependent on microscopic investigations; micrography.

micrology² (mī-krol′ō-ji), n. [< Gr. μικρολογία, the quality of being careful about trifles, < μικρολόγος, careful about trifles, penurious, captious, lit. gathering little things, < μικρός, small, little, + λέγειν, gather: see -ology. Cf. *micrology*¹.] Undue attention to minute, unimportant matters; minute erudition.

There is less micrology . . . in his erudition.
Robberds, W. Taylor, II. 146. (Davies.)

Micromastictora (mī″krō-mas-tik′tō-rä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + μαστίκτωρ, a scourger, < μαστίζειν, whip, scourge, < μάστιξ (μαστιγ-), a whip, scourge.] In Sollas's classification of sponges, one of two main branches of the phylum Parazoa or Spongiæ, characterized by the comparatively small size of the choanocytes, which are about 0.003 millimeter in diameter. The Micromastictora are all non-calcareous sponges, and are divided by Sollas into two classes, Myxospongiæ and Silicispongiæ. They are also called Noncalcarea (Vosmaer) and Plethospongiæ (Sollas). The term is contrasted with Megamastictora.

micromelus (mī-krom′e-lus), n. [< Gr. μικρομελής, small-limbed, < μικρός, small, + μέλος, a limb.] In teratol., a monster with abnormally small limbs.

micromeral (mī′krō-mē-ral), a. [< micromere + -al.] Of or pertaining to a micromere: as, micromeral blastomeres.

★micromere (mī′krō-mēr), n. [< Gr. μικρομερής, consisting of small parts, < μικρός, small, + μέρος, a part.] The smaller one of two masses or moieties into which the vitellus of a lamelli-branch, as a fresh-water mussel, divides; the so-called "animal cell" of Rabl, which further subdivides into blastomeres. See macromere.

Micromeria (mī-krō-mē′ri-ä), n. [NL. (Bentham), < Gr. μικρός, small, + μέρος, part.] A genus of labiate plants of the tribe Saturejeæ and the subtribe Melisseæ. The calyx is tubular, commonly thirteen-nerved, and about equally five-toothed. The corolla is short, rarely exserted from the calyx, bilabiate, the upper lip erect, flattish, entire, or emarginate, the lower spreading and three-parted. The filaments are arcuate-ascending, the anterior pair longer; the anthers are two-celled. The flowers are borne in whorls, axillary or crowded into a spike, or are sometimes single or cymose in the opposite axils. The species, numbering about 60, are low herbs or somewhat shrubby plants, sweet-odorous, of various habit, distributed pretty widely in the old world, with a few in South America and the West Indies, and two or three in the United States. M. Chamissonis is a well-known sweet-scented herb of California called yerba buena. M. obovata of the West Indies has been called altheal.

micromeric (mī-krō-mer′ik), a. [< micromere + -ic.] Same as micromeral.

micromeritic (mī″krō-mē-rit′ik), a. [Gr. μικρός, small, + μέρος, a part.] A term suggested by Vogelsang for a granitoid or thoroughly crystalline texture of a rock so fine as to be recognizable only with the aid of the microscope.

micrometer¹ (mī′krō-mē-tėr), n. [< micro- + *meter*³.] A unit of length equal to a millionth of a meter, or to a thousandth of a millimeter, hence to a micron or to $\frac{1}{25400}$ of an inch.

micrometer² (mī-krom′e-tėr), n. [= F. micromètre=Sp. micrómetro=Pg. It. micrometro, < Gr. μικρός, small, + μέτρον, measure.] An instrument for measuring very small lengths and angles. All micrometers depend upon two principles, magnification and oblique measurement. Magnification determines an angle by measuring the arc that subtends it upon a circle of large fixed radius, having its center coincident with the vertex of the angle. Thus, a mirror turning through a small angle may reflect a spot of light upon a distant scale. Oblique measurement (see diagonal scale, under diagonal) ascertains a length by measuring the distance at which it subtends a small fixed angle. Thus, the wedge-micrometer is a long wedge-shaped piece of metal or glass with its sloping sides as truly plane as possible, and graduated along its length. It is used to measure the distance between two points having a rigid circuitous connection, but a vacant space about the line between them. The wedge being thrust between the points, the distance it penetrates shows how far apart they are. The principle of oblique measurement is, in nearly all micrometers, applied under the form of a fine screw, the number of whose revolutions and parts of a revolution, in advancing from one point to another, measures the amount of this advance. In this case the pitch of the screw is the fixed angle, while the reading of the screw-head is proportional to the variable radius at which this angle is subtended by the length to be measured.—Annular or circular micrometer, a micrometer consisting, in its most approved form, of a disk of parallel plate glass, having in its center a round hole to the edges of which a ring of metal is cemented and afterward truly turned in a lathe. The disk being mounted in a brass tube, so that it may be accurately adjusted in the focus of the eyepiece and applied to a telescope, the metal ring is alone visible, and appears as if suspended in the atmosphere, whence the instrument is called the suspended annular micrometer. Brande and Cox, Dict., II. 516 (changed).—Double-image micrometer, a micrometer having an optical apparatus which produces two images of every object, as A and A′, B and B′. Then, A may be brought into coincidence with B′, or B may be brought into coincidence with A′, and the position of the parts producing the double image will then show the distance between A and B.—Filar micrometer, a micrometer in which the two objects whose distance is to be measured are brought into coincidence with two spider-lines in the principal focus of a telescope or microscope, one of these webs being movable by turning a micrometer-screw. The astronomical filar micrometer is also provided with a graduated position-circle, apparatus for illumination, etc.—Micrometer-balance, a form of balance adapted to the exact determination of very small weights or differences in weight. That devised by Kershaw for testing the weight of gold pieces consists of a steelyard supported on a knife-edged fulcrum and geared with a wheel graduated to half-grains. If the coin is of correct weight, the index points to zero. If it is light, the leverage of the beam turns the wheel until equilibrium is attained, when the index-bar points to the number of half-grains of shortage. E. H. Knight.—Mother-of-pearl micrometer, Cavallo's micrometer, which consists of a thin semitransparent piece of mother-of-pearl, $\frac{1}{20}$ of an inch wide, having fine graduations. It is mounted within the tube at the focus of the eye-lens of the telescope, where the image of the object under observation is produced.

micrometer-screw (mī-krom′e-tėr-skrō), n. A screw attached to optical and mathematical instruments as a means of measuring very small angles. The pitch of the screw is made exceedingly small, while the graduated head is large, thus securing great exactness and simplicity in use.

micrometric (mī-krō-met′rik), a. [= F. micrométrique; as micrometer + -ic.] Pertaining to the micrometer; made by the micrometer: as, micrometric measurements.

micrometrical (mī-krō-met′ri-kal), a. [< micrometric + -al.] Same as micrometric.

micrometrically (mī-krō-met′ri-kal-i), adv. By means of a micrometer.

micrometry (mī-krom'et-ri), n. [= F. micrométrie; as micrometer + -y[3].] The art of measuring small objects or distances with a micrometer.

micromillimeter, micromillimetre (mī-krō-mil'i-mē-tėr), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. millimeter.] 1. The millionth part of a millimeter; a millimicron.—2. The thousandth part of a millimeter: formerly used by biologists. The term used by physicists is micron.

micromineralogical (mī″krō-min″ę-ra-loj'i-kal), a. [< micromineralog-y + -ic-al.] Pertaining to micromineralogy.

Rocks may occur the structure of which . . . has been yet more obscured by subsequent micromineralogical change. Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLIV. 42.

micromineralogy (mī-krō-min-ę-ral'ō-ji), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. mineralogy.] That part of mineralogy which has to do with the study of the optical, chemical, or other characters of minerals by means of the microscope, as they are observed, for example, in thin sections of rocks.

micron (mī'kron), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρόν, neut. of μικρός, also σμικρός, small, minute.] The millionth part of a meter, hence a micrometer or a thousandth of a millimeter, or $\frac{1}{25400}$ of an inch. This term has been formally adopted by the International Commission of Weights and Measures, and is adopted by all metrologists. The quantity is denoted by the Greek letter μ written above the line: as $25.4^{\mu} = 1$ mil.

Micronesian (mī-krō-nē'si-an), a. and n. [< Micronesia (< Gr. μικρόνησος, a small island, < μικρός, small, + νῆσος, an island: see def.) + -an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to Micronesia, a collection of islands and groups of islands, chiefly of coral formation, in the Pacific ocean, the principal of which are the Marshall, Gilbert, Caroline, and Ladrone groups.

II. n. A native or an inhabitant of Micronesia.

micronometer (mī-krō-nom'e-tėr), n. A corrupt form of microchronometer.

micronucleus (mī-krō-nū'klē-us), n.; pl. micronuclei (-ī). [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + NL. nucleus, q. v.] A small nucleus; specially, in Infusoria, the reproductive nucleus as opposed to the nutritive nucleus or macronucleus.

micronymy (mī-kron'i-mi), n. [< Gr. μικρώνυμος, < μικρός, small, + ὄνυμα, ὄνομα, name.] The use of short easy words instead of long hard ones.

Astronomers have set an example in micronymy that anatomists might well follow.
Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, VIII. 529.

micro-organic (mī″krō-ôr-gan'ik), a. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. organic, after micro-organism.] Having the character of a micro-organism; of or pertaining to microbes and other micro-organisms; microbial.

micro-organism (mī-krō-ôr'gan-izm), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. organism.] A microscopic organism, as a bacillus, bacterium, or vibrio; a microbe; a microzoary.

The microörganisms of the principal infectious diseases of men and the lower animals. Amer. Nat., XXIII. 56.

Micropalama (mī-krō-pal'a-mä), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + παλάμη, the palm of the hand: see palm[1].] A genus of Scolopacidæ established by S. F. Baird in 1858: so called from the Stilt-sandpiper (Micropalama himantopus).

semipalmation of the feet; the stilt-sandpipers. There is but one species, M. himantopus, a common bird of North America. It is migratory through the United States in spring and fall, breeding in high latitudes.

micropantograph (mī-krō-pan'tō-gräf), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. pantograph.] An instrument constructed on the general principle of the pantograph for executing extremely minute writing and engraving. By means of this instrument the Lord's prayer has been written on glass within the space of $\frac{1}{250000}$ of a square inch. Also called micrograph.

microparasite (mī-krō-par'a-sīt), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. parasite.] A parasitic microorganism.

The number of substances which are less injurious to man than to micro-parasites is very small.
Science, III. 130.

microparasitic (mī-krō-par-a-sit'ik), a. [< microparasite + -ic.] Having the character of or pertaining to microparasites; caused by microparasites: as, microparasitic diseases.

micropathological (mī-krō-path-ō-loj'i-kal), a. [< micropathology + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to micropathology: as, micropathological investigation.

micropathologist (mī″krō-pā-thol'ō-jist), n. [< micropathology + -ist.] One who treats of or is versed in micropathology.

micropathology (mī″krō-pā-thol'ō-ji), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. pathology.] 1. The scientific study of micro-organisms in their relations to disease.—2. Morbid histology.

micropegmatite (mī-krō-peg'ma-tīt), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. pegmatite.] A microscopic intergrowth of quartz and feldspar.

micropegmatitic (mī-krō-peg-ma-tit'ik), a. [< micropegmatite + -ic.] Having the structure of graphic granite, but in a microscopic rather than macroscopic form. See pegmatite and microgranulitic.

microperthitic (mī″krō-pėr-thit'ik), a. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. perthite + -ic.] Exhibiting, under the microscope, the structure of perthite—that is, an interlamination of orthoclase (or microcline) and albite. Nature, XXXVII. 459.

microphagist (mī-krof'a-jist), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + φαγεῖν, eat, + -ist.] An eater of microscopic objects; an animal that feeds upon organisms of microscopic size.

Several species [of diatoms] . . . have been supplied in abundance by the careful dissection of the above microphagists. W. B. Carpenter, Micros. (Phila. ed., 1856), p. 305.

★microphone (mī'krō-fōn), n. [= F. microphone = Sp. micrófono, < Gr. μικρός, small, + φωνή, voice, sound.] An instrument for augmenting small sounds. The instrument invented for this purpose by Mr. Hughes in 1878 is based on the fact that when substances possessing little electrical conductivity are placed in the course of an electric current, the conductivity of the system is much increased by even the very smallest amount of pressure. The instrument has various forms, but in most of them one piece of charcoal is held loosely between two other pieces in such a manner as to be affected by the slightest vibrations conveyed to it by the air or by any other medium. The two external pieces are placed in connection with a telephone, and when the ear is placed at the ear-piece of the telephone the sounds caused by a fly walking on the wooden support of the microphone appear as loud as the tramp of a horse. By suitable arrangements the sounds of the human voice conveyed from a distance by the telephone can be made audible in every part of a hall.—Microphone relay, a delicate microphone mounted on or connected with the membrane of the receiving telephone, as a relay. See relay.

★microphonic (mī-krō-fon'ik), a. [As microphone + -ic.] Of or pertaining to or obtained by means of the microphone; serving to intensify small or weak sounds; microcoustic. Also microphonous.

A large induction-coil is essential in connection with the transmitter when this receiver is used, and any microphonic transmitter will answer.
T. D. Lockwood, Elect., Mag., and Teleg., p. 315.

microphonics (mī-krō-fon'iks), n. [Pl. of microphonic*: see -ics.] The science of augmenting small sounds.

microphonous (mī-krof'ō-nus), a. [As microphone + -ous.] Same as microphonic.

★microphony (mī'krō-fō-ni), n. [= F. microphonie, < Gr. μικροφωνία, weakness of voice, < μικρόφωνος, having a small or weak voice, < μικρός, small, + φωνή, voice.] Weakness of voice.

microphotograph (mī-krō-fō'tō-gräf), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. photograph.] 1. A photograph of any object, made so small as to require a microscope for its examination; "a microscopic photograph of a macroscopic object" (A. C. Mercer).—2. See photomicrograph.

microphotography (mī″krō-fō-tog'ra-fi), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. photography.] The photographing of objects of any size upon a microscopic or very small scale. A notable use of microphotography was the copying of letters and despatches to be carried by carrier-pigeons during the siege of Paris in 1870–1. Compare photomicrography.

microphthalmia (mī-krof-thal'mi-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρόφθαλμος, having small eyes, < μικρός, small, + ὀφθαλμός, eye: see ophthalmia.] An abnormal smallness of the eye. Also microphthalmy.

microphthalmic (mī-krof-thal'mik), a. [< microphthalmia + -ic.] Pertaining to or characterized by microphthalmia.

microphthalmy (mī'krof-thal-mi), n. [< NL. microphthalmia, q. v.] Same as microphthalmia.

Microphthira (mī-krof-thī'rä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μικρος, small, + φθείρ, a louse.] In Latreille's system of classification, the ninth family of his Acera, or Acarides, consisting of the six-legged larval stages of various mites. Leptus and the two other supposed genera which he located here represent the genera Argas and Trombidium. Also Microphthiria.

microphthire (mī'krof-thīr), n. A larval acarid with six legs; a member of the Microphthira.

microphylline (mī-krō-fil'in), a. [As microphyll-ous + -ine.] Composed of minute leaflets or scales.

Considered in the way of analogy, the foliaceous Verrucariæi may be said to represent Umbilicaria and Pannaria: passing, like both of these, into microphylline, and, like the last, into finally almost crustaceous forms.
Tuckerman, Gen. Lichenum, p. 245.

microphyllous (mī-krō-fil'us), a. [< Gr. μικρόφυλλος, having small leaves, < μικρός, small, + φύλλον, leaf.] In bot., having small leaves.

microphysiography (mī-krō-fiz-i-og'ra-fi), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. physiography.] See physiography.

microphytal (mī'krō-fī-tal), a. [< microphyte + -al.] Pertaining to, of the nature of, or consisting of microphytes.

microphyte (mī'krō-fīt), n. [= F. microphyte, < Gr. μικρός, small, + φυτόν, a plant.] A microscopic plant, especially one that is parasitic in its habits.

microphytic (mī-krō-fit'ik), a. [< microphyte + -ic.] Pertaining to or caused by microphytes: as, microphytic diseases.

micropod (mī'krō-pod), n. A member of the Micropoda.

Micropoda (mī-krop'ō-dä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + ποῦς (ποδ-) = E. foot.] In some systems, a division of monomyarian bivalves, comprising those which have the foot rudimentary or obsolete, as scallops, oysters, and the like.

Micropodidæ (mī-krō-pod'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Micropus (-pod-) + -idæ.] In ornith., a family of fissirostral picarian birds; the swifts or Cypselidæ. See cut under Cypselus.

Micropodinæ (mī″krō-pō-dī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Micropus (-pod-) + -inæ.] In ornith., the typical swifts or Cypselinæ.

Micropodoideæ (mī″krō-pō-doi'dē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Micropus (-pod-) + -oideæ.] A superfamily of picarian birds composed of the swifts and humming-birds, Cypselidæ and Trochilidæ; Cypseliformes in a strict sense; Cypselomorphæ without the Caprimulgidæ.

microporphyritic (mī-krō-pôr-fi-rit'ik), a. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. porphyritic.] See porphyritic.

★microprosopus (mī″krō-pro-sō'pus), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + πρόσωπον, face.] In teratol., a monster with an imperfectly developed face.

micropsia (mī-krop'si-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + ὄψις, view.] In pathol., an affection of the eye in which objects appear less than their actual size.

Microptera (mī-krop'tę-rä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of micropterus: see micropterous.] In entom.: (a) The name given by Gravenhorst in 1802 to the rove-beetles (Staphylinidæ) and their allies, on account of the shortness of the wing-covers. They are now called Brachelytra. (b) A group of dipterous insects named by Robineau-Desvoidy in 1830.

Micropterinæ (mī-krop-tę-rī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Micropterus + -inæ.] A subfamily of Centrarchidæ, typified by the genus Micropterus.

micropterous (mī-krop'tę-rus), a. [< NL. micropterus, < Gr. μικρός, small, + πτερόν, a wing, = E. feather.] Having short wings or fins.

Micropterus (mī-krop'tę-rus), n. [NL.: see micropterous.] 1. In ichth., a genus of centrarchid fishes, the type of the subfamily Micropterinæ, established by Lacépède in 1802. There are two species, M. dolomieu and M. salmoides, or the small- and large-mouthed black-bass, both highly prized by sportsmen and epicures. Bass of this genus are variously known as green-, lake-, moss-, marsh-, river-, etc., bass; black-, yellow-, and jumping-perch, and trout-perch; black-trout, white-trout, southern or Roanoke chub, and by many other local or fanciful misnomers. Sometimes called Grystes. See cut at black-bass, 1.

2. In ornith., a genus of sea-ducks of the family Anatidæ and subfamily Fuligulinæ, named by Lesson in 1831. There is but one species, M. cinereus, the well-known steamer-duck of South America. The genus is now called Tachyeres, the name Micropterus being preoccupied in ichthyology.

3. In entom., a genus of coleopterous insects.

Micropuccinia (mī″krō-puk-sin′i-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + NL. Puccinia.] A small group of Uredinales, distinguished by Schroeter, in which only teleutospores are known at present, as in Puccinia Pruni and P. virgaureæ. The teleutospores drop off when ripe, and only germinate after a long period ★of rest. See Uredinales.

Micropus (mī′krō-pus), n. [NL., < MGr. μικρόπους, having small feet, < Gr. μικρός, small, + πούς (ποδ-) = E. foot.] 1. In ornith.: (a) The typical genus of Micropodidæ: same as Cypselus. Meyer and Wolf, 1810. (b) A genus of short-footed thrushes or Brachypodinæ founded by Swainson in 1831, now referred to the Timeliidæ. It contains a number of Indian and Malayan species, as M. chalcocephalus, phæocephalus, melanocephalus, melanoleucus, and others. The genus is also called Microtarsus, Brachypodius, Prosecusa, and Ixocherus. 2. In ichth., a name of two genera of fishes, one founded by J. E. Gray, 1831, the other by Kner, 1868.—3. In entom., a tropical American genus of lygæid bugs erected by Spinola in 1837. For a long time the destructive chinch-bug of the United States was called M. destructor, but it is now placed in the genus Blissus.

micropylar (mī′krō-pī-lär), a. [< micropyle + -ar.] Pertaining to or having the character of ★a micropyle.

micropyle (mī′krō-pīl), n. [= F. micropyle, < Gr. μικρός, small, + πύλη, gate, orifice.] 1. In bot., the orifice or canal in the coats of the ovule leading to the apex of the nucellus, through which the pollen-tube penetrates. The name is also applied to the corresponding part of the seed, which indicates the position of the embryo. See foramen, 2. See cut under amphitropous. 2. In zoöl.: (a) The scar or hilum of an ovum at the point of its attachment to the ovary. (b) Any opening in the coverings of an ovum through which spermatozoa may gain access to the interior, or a cluster of minute pores on the surface of an egg through which fertilization is effected. On the eggs of lepidopterous insects these pores often form a rosette at one end.

microrhabd (mī′krō-rabd), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + NL. rhabdus, q. v.] A little rhabdus; a microsclere or flesh-spicule of a sponge in the form of a rhabdus. W. J. Sollas, Encyc. Brit., XXII. 417.

microrheometrical (mī-krō-rē-ō-met′ri-kal), a. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + ῥοία, a flowing (< ῥεῖν, flow), + μέτρον, a measure. Cf. rheometric.] Pertaining to a method of determining the nature of bodies in solution when flowing through small or capillary tubes.

Microrhynchus (mī-krō-ring′kus), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + ῥύγχος, snout, beak.] In mammal., a genus of woolly lemurs, of the subfamily Indrisinæ. The species is called M. laniger. See avahi.

Microsauria (mī-krō-sâ′ri-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + σαῦρος, a lizard.] A group of labyrinthodont amphibians founded by J. W. Dawson upon the genera Dendrerpeton, Hylerpeton, and Hylonomus.

microsaurian (mī-krō-sâ′ri-an), a. and n. [< Microsauria + -an.] I. a. Pertaining to the Microsauria, or having their characters.

II. n. A member of the group Microsauria.

microsclere (mī′krō-sklēr), n. [< NL. microsclerum, < Gr. μικρός, small, + σκληρός, hard.] A flesh-spicule of a sponge. Microscleres are generally of minute size, and serve usually for the support of a single cell.

microsclerous (mī-krō-sklē′rus), a. [As microsclere + -ous.] Having the character of a microsclere.

microsclerum (mī-krō-sklē′rum), n.; pl. microsclera (-rä). [NL.] Same as microsclere.

microscope (mī′krō-skōp), n. [= F. microscope = Sp. Pg. It. microscopio, < NL. microscopium, < Gr. μικρός, small, + σκοπεῖν, view.] 1. An optical instrument consisting of a lens or combination of lenses (in some cases mirrors also) which magnifies and thus renders visible minute objects that cannot be seen by the naked eye, or enlarges the apparent magnitude of small visible bodies, so as to render possible the examination of their texture or structure. The single microscope, which is the simplest form, is merely a convex lens, near to which the object to be examined is placed; it is also called a magnifying-glass or -lens (see magnifying-lens, under lens). The compound microscope consists essentially of two lenses, or systems of lenses, one of which, the object-glass or objective, forms an enlarged inverted image of the object, and the other, the eyepiece or ocular, magnifies this image. The eyepiece and objective (see these words) are placed at the opposite ends of the tube or body, which is often made of two closely fitting parts so that its length (and thus the distance between the glasses) can be varied at will; it is then called a draw-tube. The object under examination is placed upon a support, called the stage, beneath the objective; its position upon this may be adjusted by the hand, or, better, the object and the stage (then called a mechanical stage) are moved together by some mechanical arrangement, as, for example, by two screws giving motions in two directions at right angles. The proper distance between the objective and the object (such that the image of the latter shall be seen clearly, or be in focus) is usually attained by the movement of the tube as a whole. This is accomplished by the rapid motion of the coarse adjustment, and more slowly and accurately, as is necessary in the case of high powers, by an arrangement called the slow motion or fine adjustment. The necessary illumination is obtained by a concave mirror below the stage, which reflects the light upon the object. An achromatic condenser, usually in connection with a diaphragm, is often added to converge the light more strongly; for opaque objects a bull's-eye condenser, a lieberkühn, or some other form of reflector is employed. The body of the microscope, with the stage, etc., is supported firmly upon a stand, and usually attached by a joint which allows of its being inclined at any desired angle between the vertical and horizontal positions. Many accessories, or special devices applicable to particular uses, may be added to the microscope in its essential form, as a micrometer, polarizing prisms, camera lucida, etc. The compound microscope itself often varies widely in construction, according to the character of the work for which it is to be used. (Compare also the phrases below.)

2. [cap.] A constellation. See Microscopium.—Achromatic microscope. See achromatic.—Binocular microscope, a microscope so constructed that the object may be viewed simultaneously by both eyes, with the advantage (usually but not necessarily attained) that it is then seen in relief. It has a single objective, but two tubes, each with its own eyepiece; a prism causes the luminous rays from the objective to separate and pass through each tube.—Double-bodied microscope, a microscope in which the object under examination can be viewed by more than one person at the same time. As in the binocular microscope, a prism divides the rays from the objective. Two other prisms receive the separated rays, and the respective pencils are directed through the different bodies of the instrument.—Filar microscope, a microscope having cross-wires in the focus of the eyepiece.—Inverted or chemical microscope, one with the object-glass placed beneath the object and the stage. The luminous rays which have passed down through it are reflected by an inverting prism up the obliquely placed tube to the eyepiece. This form is sometimes used in chemical work, when acid fumes are present.—Magnifying power of a microscope. See magnify.—Monocular microscope, one with a single tube, for use with one eye only.—Pankratic microscope, a name sometimes given to a microscope having the eyepiece in a sliding draw-tube (see def. 1).—Petrographical microscope, a form of microscope especially adapted for minute study of the structure of rocks. It is provided with a graduated and revolving stage and an arrangement for accurately centering the object-glass. It has also a polarizing apparatus, of which the upper nicol prism or analyzer is contained in a separate support which can be easily revolved on a graduated circle or removed at will. The lower nicol or polarizer is supported beneath the stage, and can also be revolved in a graduated collar. With these arrangements the directions of light-extinction in a section of a crystal can easily be determined. Besides the usual eyepiece and object-glass, an additional lens, or series of lenses, can be placed over the lower nicol prism when converging light is required, as in examining the uniaxial or biaxial interference-figures of crystal-sections.—Reflecting microscope, a form of microscope in which the object is placed outside of the tube, or outside the axis of the tube, and reflects its image to the speculum by means of a plane mirror inclined at an angle of 45° to the axis of the former.—Solar, lucernal, and oxyhydrogen microscopes, instruments in which the illumination employed comes from the sun, a lamp, and an oxyhydrogen lime-light respectively.

Binocular Microscope.

A, A, eyepieces; B, screw to adjust same to width of eyes; C, screw for coarse adjustment of focus; D, screw for fine adjustment of focus; E, objective; F, stage; G, G, rectangular traversing movement; H, rotatory movement; I, illuminating mirror.

Petrographical or Polarization Microscope (after Rosenbusch), sectional view.

p p, fixed support in which the tube is moved by hand (coarse adjustment); g, screw of the fine adjustment; r r, polarizer; s s, analyzer, in movable support turning on the graduated circle f f; T, T, condensing lenses; i, index for fixing position of rotating stage; z z, quartz plate, which slides in nose-piece above objective through slit at t t; n n, one of two screws for centering objective.

microscope-lamp (mī′krō-skōp-lamp), n. A special form of lantern, usually provided with a reflector, a bull's-eye lens, and a metallic chimney lined with some poor conductor of heat. Means are provided for adjusting the lamp in any position in order to throw the light upon the object under examination.

microscopic (mī-krō-skop′ik), a. [< F. microscopique = Sp. Pg. It. microscopico, < NL. microscopicus, < microscopium, microscope: see microscope.] 1. Pertaining to a microscope, or having its character or function; adapted to the purposes of a microscope, or to the inspection of minute objects: as, a microscopic lens, eyepiece, or stand; microscopic sight or vision.

> Why has not man a microscopic eye?
> For this plain reason, man is not a fly.
> Pope, Essay on Man, i. 193.
>
> Such microscopic proof of skill and power
> As, hid from ages past, God now displays.
> Cowper, Tirocinium, l. 637.

The present limit to microscopic vision is simply the goodness of the objective.

Amer. Jour. Sci., 2d ser., XLVIII. 172.

2. Of minute size; so small as to be invisible or indistinct to the naked eye; adapted to or prepared for examination by the miscroscope: as, microscopic creatures or particles; a microscopic object.—3. Made or effected by or as if by the aid of a microscope; hence, relating to things of minute size or significance; infinitesimal; petty: as, microscopic observations or investigations; microscopic criticism.

So far as microscopic analysis would enable us to decide this question. Todd and Bowman, Physiol. Anat., II. 301.

4. Characteristic of the microscope or its use: as, to observe anything with microscopic minuteness; microscopic definition of an object.—5. Employing or working with a microscope, or as if with a microscope.

The tree that has stood for centuries bears to the microscopic investigator marks of every winter that has passed over it. Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 103.

Also microscopical.

Microscopica (mī-krō-skop′i-kä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of microscopicus: see microscopic.] In zoöl., microscopic animals; microzoans: applied to infusorians, rotifers, and other animalcules.

microscopical (mī-krō-skop′i-kal), a. [< microscopic + -al.] Same as microscopic.

microscopically (mī-krō-skop′i-kal-i), adv. [< microscopical + *-ly*2.] In a microscopic manner or degree; by means of, or so as to require the use of, the microscope: as, to examine a plant microscopically; an object microscopically small.

microscopist (mī-kros′kō-pist, mī′krō-skō-pist), n. [< F. microscopiste = It. microscopista; as microscope + -ist.] One versed in microscopy; one who uses the microscope.

Microscopium (mī-krō-skō′pi-um), n. [NL.: see microscope.] A constellation south of Capricorn, introduced by Lacaille in 1752.

microscopy (mī′krō-skō-pi), n. [= F. microscopie = Sp. microscopía; as microscope + *-y*3.] The act or art of using the microscope; investigation with the microscope: as, to be skilled in microscopy.

microsection (mī-krō-sek′shon), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. section.] A slice, as of rock, cut so thin as to be more or less transparent, and mounted on a glass in convenient form to be studied with the aid of the microscope.

microseism (mī′krō-sīsm), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + σεισμός, a shaking.] A slight or weak earthquake-tremor.

We may feel sure that earth-tremors or microseisms are not confined to countries habitually visited by the grosser sort of earthquakes.

G. H. Darwin, Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXI. 368.

microseismic (mī-krō-sīs′mik), a. [< microseism + -ic.] In seismology, of, pertaining to, or of the nature of microseisms, or very slight earthquake-tremors.

Should microseismic observation enable us to say when and where the minute movements of the soil will reach a head, a valuable contribution to the insurance of human safety in earthquake regions will have been attained.

J. Milne, Earthquakes, p. 304.

microseismical (mī-krō-sīs′mi-kal), a. [< microseismic + -al.] Microseismic.

A series of microseismical observations.

J. Milne, Earthquakes, p. 316.

microseismograph (mī-krō-sīs′mō-graf), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + σεισμός, a shaking, + γράφειν, write.] An instrument for measuring and recording very slight earthquake-shocks or earth-tremors.

microseismometry (mī″krō-sīs-mom'et-ri), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + σεισμός, a shaking, + -μετρία, < μέτρον, a measure.] The measurement or observation of slight earth-tremors.

The account that is given of the labours of Italian observers in the field of microseismometry is meagre and unsatisfactory. Nature, XXXIX. 338.

microseme (mī'krō-sēm), a. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + σῆμα, mark, sign: see sema.] In anthrop., having a small index; specifically, in craniom., having an orbital index below 84 (Flower), below 83 (Broca), below 80 (German anthropologists).

microseptum (mī-krō-sep'tum), n.; pl. microsepta (-tȧ). [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + NL. septum, q. v.] A small imperfect or sterile septum or mesentery of an actinozoan. See macroseptum.

microsiphon (mī-krō-sī'fon), n. See siphon and microsiphonula.

microsiphonula (mī″krō-sī-fon'ū-lȧ), n.; pl. microsiphonulæ (-lē). [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + σίφων, a tube, pipe: see siphon.] The larval stage of certain cephalopods, as ammonoids, nautiloids, and belemnoids, during which the small tubular siphon or microsiphon makes its appearance. Hyatt, Proc. Bost. Soc. Nat. Hist., 1887.

microsiphonular (mī″krō-sī-fon'ū-lăr), a. [< microsiphonula + *-ar*³.] Of or pertaining to a microsiphonula.

microsiphonulate (mī″krō-sī-fon'ū-lāt), a. [< microsiphonula + *-ate*¹.] Provided with or characterized by a microsiphon. Amer. Nat., XXII. 878.

microsiphonulation (mī″krō-sī-fon-ū-lā'shǫn), n. [< microsiphonula + -ation.] The formation or the possession of a microsiphon; the state of being microsiphonulate. Amer. Nat., XXII. 878.

microsoma (mī-krō-sō'mȧ), n.; pl. microsomata (-ma-tȧ). [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + σῶμα, body.] A little body or corpuscle; one of the minute granules embedded in the hyaline plasm of the protoplasm of vegetable cells, and constituting an essential portion of its substance. These granules have a high degree of refringency, and are ★very deeply stained by hematoxylin.

microsome (mī'krō-sōm), n. [< NL. microsoma.] Same as microsoma. Nature, XXX. 183.

microsomia (mī-krō-sō'mi-ȧ), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + σῶμα, body. Cf. microsoma.] The state of being dwarfed; dwarfishness.

microsomite (mī-krō-sō'mīt), n. [< microsoma + *-ite*².] One of the smaller permanent or definitive somites or metameres of which an animal body may be composed; a secondary segment, succeeding the primary segments or macrosomites.

microsomitic (mī″krō-sō-mit'ik), a. [< microsomite + -ic.] Having the character of a microsomite; relating to microsomites. Amer. Nat., XXII. 941.

microsommite (mī-krō-som'īt), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + Somma (see def.) + *-ite*².] A mineral related in composition and form to nephelin. It is found in minute acicular hexagonal crystals in the lava of Monte Somma, Vesuvius.

Microsorex (mī-krō-sō'reks), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + L. sorex = Gr. ὗραξ, a shrew-mouse.] A genus of very small North American shrews, of the family Soricidæ and subfamily Soricinæ, having 30 teeth. S. hoyi is the typical species. Coues, 1877.

microspectroscope (mī-krō-spek'trō-skōp), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. spectroscope.] A combination of the spectroscope with the microscope, by the use of which it is possible to examine the absorption-bands in minute quantities of a substance. The arrangement ordinarily employed consists of a series of glass prisms in a small tube which is attached above the achromatic eyepiece.

Microspermæ (mī-krō-spėr'mē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1883), < Gr. μικρός, small, + σπέρμα, a seed.] A series of monocotyledonous plants, characterized by a perianth which is corolla-like, at least on the inside, by an inferior ovary which is one-celled with three parietal placentæ, or rarely three-celled with axillary placentæ, and by numerous very small seeds. The series embraced three families, Hydrocharidaceæ, Burmanniaceæ, and Orchidaceæ. Engler retains the name for the last two families, but places the first in a much earlier series, the Helobiæ.

Microsphæra (mī-krō-sfē'rȧ), n. [NL. (Leveillé, 1851), < Gr. μικρός, small, + σφαῖρα, a sphere.] A genus of parasitic pyrenomycetous fungi of the family Erysiphaceæ. The perithecium, which contains several asci, has several appendages radiating from it like the spokes of a wheel. These appendages are free from the mycelium, and are more or less dichotomously branched at the tips, often in a very beautiful manner. About 50 species have been described, many of which occur in North America. M. alni is injurious to the honey-locust (Gleditsia) and also occurs on various species of Ceanothus, Viburnum, Ulmus, Syringa, Platanus, Juglans, and Hicoria; and M. grossulariæ is found on various species of Ribes, especially in Europe. See Erysiphæ.

microsporangiophore (mī″krō-spǫ-ran'ji-ǫ-fōr), n. [< NL. microsporangium, q. v., + Gr. -φόρος, < φέρειν = E. *bear*¹.] The foliage-leaves which surround or protect the spore-bearing leaves of certain hypothetical archaic cryptogams, and from which the flower of flowering plants may have been evolved.

The origin of this primeval flower from a somewhat fern-like Cryptogam, of which the foliage-leaves, the envelopes of the spore-bearing leaves, the micro- and macro-sporangiophores, had become permanently differentiated in ascending order. Geddes, Encyc. Brit., XVI. 846.

microsporangium (mī″krō-spǫ-ran'ji-um), n.; pl. microsporangia (-ȧ). [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + NL. sporangium, q. v.] A sporangium containing microspores: the homologue of the pollen-sac in phanerogams.

microspore (mī'krō-spōr), n. [= F. microspore, < Gr. μικρός, small, + σπόρος, a seed.] 1. In bot., an asexually produced spore of small size as compared with others produced by the same species: the homologue of the pollen-grain of phanerogams.

In some of the living club-mosses there are two kinds of spores, one being much larger than the other. The larger are known as macrospores, whilst the smaller are called microspores. Huxley, Physiography, p. 241.

2. In zoöl., one of the spore-like elements, of exceedingly minute size, but very numerous, produced through the encystment and subsequent subdivision of many monads.

microsporine (mī-krō-spō'rin), a. [< microspore + *-ine*¹.] Noting one of the two kinds of bacteria reported by Klebs to be uniformly present in diphtheria. They are micrococcoid in form and are found chiefly upon the tonsils, and mark a less serious phase of the disease. The accuracy of these conclusions has been questioned.

Microsporon (mi-kros'pǫ-ron), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + σπόρος, seed.] A group of fungi producing various skin-diseases. M. furfur, which produces pityriasis versicolor, consists of hyphæ having long articulations intermixed with round spores, and grows between the cells of the epidermis, effecting their rapid degeneration. M. Audouini, so called, produces pelade, another skin-disease. According to Grawitz, however, these forms, as well as those described as Achorion, the fungus of favus, and Trichophyton, the fungus of tinea, are all the same thing, only differing from one another in size. Their exact systematic relations are still uncertain. Some refer the species to Sporotrichum, others to Oöspora.

microsporophyl, microsporophyll (mī-krō-spō'rǫ-fil), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + σπόρος, seed, + φύλλον, leaf.] The leaf bearing the microsporangia of the heterosporous Pteridophyta.

microsporous (mī'krō-spō-rus), a. [< microspore + -ous.] Resembling or derived from a microspore.

Microsthena (mī-kros'the-nȧ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + σθένος, strength.] In J. D. Dana's classification, the third order of Mammalia, composed of the chiropters, insectivores, rodents, and edentates. The Microsthena correspond to the Lissencephala of Owen, and to the ineducabilian series of placental mammals of Bonaparte and Gill.

microsthene (mī'krō-sthēn), n. A member of the order Microsthena.

microsthenic (mī-krō-sthen'ik), a. [< Microsthena + -ic.] Pertaining to or characteristic of the Microsthena. J. D. Dana, Cephalization, p. 9.

Microstoma (mī-kros'tǫ-mȧ), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρόστομος, having a small mouth, < μικρός, small, + στόμα, mouth.] 1. In ichth., a genus of small-mouthed fishes, typifying the family Microstomidæ, as M. rotundatum. Cuvier, 1817.—2. In Vermes, the typical genus of Microstomidæ. M. lineare is an example. Also Microstomum.

microstome (mī'krō-stōm), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + στόμα, a mouth.] In bot., a small mouth or orifice, as that belonging to the capsule of certain mosses.

Microstomidæ (mī-krō-stom'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Microstoma, or Microstomum, + -idæ.] 1. In ichth., a family of malacopterygian fishes, typified by the genus Microstoma, containing a few deep-sea fishes related to the argentines and smelts. Also Microstomatidæ.—2. A family of rhabdocœlous turbellarians, typified by the genus Microstoma, having a small extensile mouth near the anterior end of the body, together with laterally ciliated pits. These turbellarians are more remarkably characterized by the separation of the sexes, hermaphroditism being the rule in the Rhabdocœla. They multiply both by ova and by ★spontaneous fission.

microstructure (mī-krō-struk'tūr), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small (with ref. to microscopic), + E. structure.] Microscopic structure.

This rock . . . has a microstructure very similar to that of many andesites. Quart. Jour. Geol. Soc., XLV. 198.

microstylar (mī-krō-stī'lăr), a. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + στῦλος, pillar (see *style*²), + *-ar*³.] In arch., having, pertaining to, or consisting of a small style or column.

Microstylis (mī-krō-stī'lis), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + στυλίς, dim. of στῦλος, a pillar: see *style*².] Nuttall's name (1818) for Malaxis, a genus of terrestrial orchids of the tribe Epidendreæ, characterized by a stem bearing from one to three leaves, and by the new shoots arising from the base of the bulb of the previous year. They are small herbs with broad membranaceous leaves, which are contracted into a sheath or a sheathing petiole, and small, often greenish or yellowish flowers, which grow in terminal racemes. About 40 species are known, which are indigenous to Europe, Asia, and North and South America. Malaxis unifolia, in the United States, bears the name of adder's-mouth.

microstylospore (mī-krō-stī'lǫ-spōr), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + στῦλος, a pillar, + σπόρος, a seed: see stylospore.] A stylospore of small size as compared with others produced in the same species.

microstylous (mī-krō-stī'lus), a. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + στῦλος, a pillar: see *style*².] In bot., having the style small or short and associated with long stamens, as compared with long styles associated with short stamens.

microtasimeter (mī″krō-ta-sim'e-tėr), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. tasimeter.] An instrument invented by Edison for detecting and measuring very slight pressures. A rigid iron frame holds a carbon-button which is placed between two surfaces of platinum, one stationary and the other movable, and in a device which holds the object to be tested so that, as the object expands, the pressure resulting from the expansion acts upon the carbon-button.

microtelephone (mī-krō-tel'e-fōn), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. telephone.] A telephone capable of rendering audible very weak sounds.

microtelephonic (mī-krō-tel-e-fon'ik), a. [< microtelephone + -ic.] Pertaining to the microtelephone.—Microtelephonic apparatus, apparatus for transmitting, or for rendering audible, very weak sounds.

microthere (mī'krō-thēr), n. A member of the genus Microtherium.

Microtherium (mī-krō-thē'ri-um), n. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + θηρίον, wild beast.] A genus of artiodactyl ungulate mammals established by Von Meyer upon remains discovered in the Miocene of Europe. The position of the genus is questionable. Owen considered it related to the chevrotains (Tragulidæ). It probably belongs to the anoplotherioid series. It may be synonymous with Cœnotherium.

microtherm (mī'krō-thėrm), n. [< F. microtherme, < Gr. μικρός, small, + θέρμη, heat.] A plant of Alphonse de Candolle's fourth physiological group, consisting of those forms which are confined to climates whose mean annual temperature is between 14° and 0° C. They are found on the plains of the north temperate zone in Europe, Asia, and North America, well northward, and in South America between latitudes 38° and 65° S.

microtome (mī'krō-tōm), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + -τομος, < τέμνειν, ταμεῖν, cut.] An instrument for making very fine sections or thin slices of objects for microscopic examination.

microtomic (mī-krō-tom'ik), a. [< microtome + -ic.] Cutting in fine or thin slices; relating to the use of the microtome or to microtomy.

microtomical (mī-krō-tom'i-kal), a. [< microtomic + -al.] Same as microtomic. Amer. Nat., XXI. 1130.

microtomist (mī-krot'ǫ-mist), n. [< microtomy + -ist.] One who is expert in the use of a microtome. Micros. Sci., XXX.

microtomy (mī-krot'ǫ-mi), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + -τομία, < τέμνειν, ταμεῖν, cut: see anatomy.] The art of preparing thin slices of tissues, in order to study the histological details of organization.

microvolt (mī'krō-vōlt), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. *volt*².] A millionth part of a volt.

Microzoa (mī-krō-zō'ȧ), n. pl. [NL., pl. of microzoön.] Microscopic animals, or Microscopica; Microzoaria.

microzoal (mī-krō-zō'al), a. [< Microzoa + -al.] Of or pertaining to the Microzoa.

microzoan (mī-krō-zō′an), n. and a. I. n. An animalcule; a member of the Microzoa.

II. a. Of or pertaining to the Microzoa.

Microzoaria (mī″krō-zō-ā′ri-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + LGr. ζῷάριον, pl. ζῷάρια, dim. of Gr. ζῷον, animal.] De Blainville's name for infusorians, rotifers, and other animalcules.

microzoarian (mī″krō-zō-ā′ri-an), a. and n. [< Microzoaria + -an.] I. a. Animalcular; of or pertaining to the Microzoaria.

II. n. An animalcule; a member of the Microzoaria.

microzoary (mī-krō-zō′a-ri), n.; pl. microzoaries (-riz). [< NL. Microzoaria.] A microzoarian.

microzoöid (mī-krō-zō′oid), n. and a. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. zoöid.] I. n. A free-swimming zoöid of abnormally minute size, which conjugates with or becomes buried within the substance of the body of a normally sized sedentary animalcule of many Vorticellidæ.

II. a. Pertaining to a microzoöid.

microzoön (mī-krō-zō′on), n.; pl. microzoa (-ä). [NL., < Gr. μικρός, small, + ζῷον, an animal.] Any micro-organism of animal nature; a microzoarian.

microzoöspore (mī-krō-zō′ō-spōr), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + E. zoöspore.] A zoöspore of small size as compared with others produced by the same species.

The smaller or microzoöspores are produced by the division of the vegetative mother-cell into a larger number of portions. Huxley and Martin, Elementary Biology, p. 391.

microzyme (mī′krō-zīm), n. [< Gr. μικρός, small, + ζύμη, leaven: see zymic.] One of a class of extremely minute living organisms, existing in the atmosphere, and furnishing the basis on which certain epizoötic, epidemic, and other zymotic diseases are dependent for their existence; a zymotic microbe. These pestiferous microbes have some characters at least in which they resemble ferments, and by multiplying rapidly they excite morbid action in the animal organism with which they come in contact. See germ theory (under germ), and cuts under microbe.

Mictidæ (mik′ti-dē), n. pl. [NL. (Serville, 1843), < Mictis + -idæ.] A family of heteropterous insects, typified by the genus Mictis, having the femora spined beneath, and the hind ones thicker than the others, especially in the males. It comprises many tropical and subtropical forms, some of large size and handsome coloration, as Pachylis gigas, a North American representative. There are about 13 genera of the family. Also Mictides, Mictida, and (as a subfamily of Coreidæ) Mictina, Mictinæ.

miction (mik′shon), n. [= F. miction, < LL. mictio(n-), minctio(n-), < L. mingere, pp. minctus, mictus (= AS. migan, early ME. migen = MLG. migen = Icel. miga), urinate.] The act of voiding urine.

Mictis (mik′tis), n. [NL. (Leach, 1814); origin not ascertained.] The typical genus of Mictidæ, having the fourth antennal joint not shorter than the third. Nearly 100 species are described from Africa, southern Asia, the Malay archipelago, and Australia.

micturate (mik′tū-rāt), v. i.; pret. and pp. micturated, ppr. micturating. [Irreg. < L. micturire, pp. micturitus, urinate: see micturition.] To pass urine; urinate.

micturition (mik-tū-rish′on), n. [= F. micturition, < L. as if micturitio(n-)*, < micturire, pp. micturitus, go to urinate, desiderative of mingere, pp. mictus, urinate: see miction.] The desire to urinate; also, morbidly frequent and scant urination.

mid[1] (mid), a. and n. [< ME. mid, midde, myd, mydde, < AS. mid (a nom. form not actually found; gen. masc. and neut. middes, fem. midre, middre, etc.) = OS. middi = OFries. midde, medde = MD. mydde (a.), D. midden (n.) = MLG. midde (a.) = OHG. mitti, MHG. G. mitte = Icel. miðhr = Sw. Dan. mid (in comp.) (cf. Sw. midten = Dan. midte, n.) = Goth. midjis, mid, middle; = OBulg. mezhda, middle, boundary, = Pol. miedza = Bohem. meze = Russ. mezha, boundary (cf. OBulg. mezhdu = Serv. medju = Bohem. mezi = Pol. miedzy = Russ. mezhdu, also mezhi, between), < L. medius (> ult. E. medial, mediate, medium, etc., mean[3], moiety, mizzen, etc.) = Gr. μέσος, μέσσος (> ult. E. mesial, meson, etc.), orig. μέθjος* = Skt. madhya, middle. Hence midst[1], middle, etc.] I. a. 1. Middle; being the middle part or midst. The monosyllable mid, properly an adjective, is so closely connected with its noun as to assume often the aspect of a prefix; it is therefore often joined to its noun with a hyphen. The real relation, however, is nearly always the normal one of adjective and noun.

Pros. What is the time of day?
Ari. Past the mid season.
Shak., Tempest, i. 2. 239.

Virgins and boys, mid-age and wrinkled eld.
Shak., T. and C., ii. 2. 104

Then, with envy fraught and rage,
Flies to his place, nor rests, but in mid air
To council summons all his mighty peers.
Milton, P. R., i. 39.

No more the mounting larks, while Daphne sings, Shall, listening in mid air, suspend their wings.
Pope, Winter, l. 54.

2. Being between; intermediate; intervening: only in inseparable compounds: as, *mid*rib, *mid*riff, *mid*wicket.

II.† n. Middle; midst.

Ratcliff, about the mid of night come to my tent.
Shak., Rich. III., v. 3. 77.

In the mid he had the habit of a monk. Fuller.

It was in the mid of the day.
Robin Hood and the Stranger (Child's Ballads, V. 405).

mid[2]† (mid), prep. [ME., also myd, < AS. mid, also in old or dial. form mith, = OS. mid, midi = OFries. mith, mithe, mit = D. met = MLG. mit, in comp. mid-, LG. med, met = OHG. MHG. G. mit = Icel. medh = Sw. Dan. med = Goth. mith, in comp. mid-, with, = Gr. μετά, with, among, over, beyond, etc. (see meta-), = Zend mad, with.] With: a preposition formerly in common use, but now entirely superseded by with. It remains only in the compound midwife.

Mid him he hadde a stronge axe. Rob. of Gloucester.

mid[3] (mid), n. A dialectal form of might[1]. Halliwell.

mid[4] (mid), n. [Short for midshipman.] A midshipman. Also middy. [Colloq.]

I have written to Bedford to learn what mids of the Victory fell in that action. Southey, Letters (1812), II. 315.

mid. An abbreviation of middle (voice).

'mid (mid), prep. An abbreviation of amid, used in poetry.

mida[1] (mī′dä), n. [NL., < Gr. μίδας, a destructive insect in pulse.] The larva of the beanfly. Imp. Dict.

Mida[2] (mī′dä), n. [NL. (Cunningham, 1838), stated to be taken from a native New Zealand name.] A genus of dicotyledonous trees or shrubs belonging to the family Santalaceæ. See Fusanus.

midan (mī′dân), n. Same as maidan.

He . . . was galloping away over the moonlit midan.
Mrs. B. M. Croker, Proper Pride, II. i. 14.

midangle (mid′ang″gl), n. [< mid[1] + angle[3].] An angle of 45°; half of a right angle.

Midas[1] (mī′das), n. [NL., < (?) L. Midas, < Gr. Μίδας, a king of Phrygia.] A genus of marmosets, typical of the family Mididæ. Upward of 20 species are described. Characteristic examples are the lion-marmoset (M. leoninus), the tamarin (M. ursulus), the pinche (M. œdipus), and the marikina (M. rosalia).

Midas[2] (mī′das), n. [NL., < Gr. μίδας, a destructive insect in pulse.] In entom., the typical genus of Mididæ or Midasidæ. The species are mainly North American, as 26 against 3 in Europe. Their larvæ as far as known occur in decaying wood, and are probably carnivorous. M. fulvipes and M. clavatus are examples. Latreille, 1796. Also Mydas (Fabricius, 1794).

Midasidæ (mī-das′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., irreg. < Midas[2] + -idæ.] In entom., same as Mididæ, 2. Leach, 1819.

Midas's-ear (mī′das-ez-ēr), n. [So called in allusion to Midas, a king of Phrygia, who, for a decision he rendered in a musical contest between Apollo and Pan, was provided by Apollo (who lost) with ass's ears.] A gastropod of the family Auriculidæ, Auricula midæ.

midbody (mid′bod″i), n. [< mid[1] + body.] In Mollusca, the mesosoma.

midbrain (mid′brān), n. [< mid[1] + brain.] The mesencephalon. See cuts under encephalon.

mid-couples (mid′kup″lz), n. pl. In Scots law, the writings by which an heir, assignee, or adjudger is connected with a precept of sasine granted in favor of his predecessor or author, which, when such heir, etc., takes infeftment in virtue of such precept, must be deduced in the instrument of sasine. Imp. Dict.

midday (mid′dā), n. and a. [< ME. midday, < AS. middæg (also middeldæg) (= OFries. middei = D. middag = MLG. middach = OHG. mittitak, MHG. mittetac, G. mittag = Sw. Dan. middag), < mid, mid, + dæg, day: see mid[1] and day[1].] I. n. The middle of the day; noon.

Had he [our Lord] appeared at mid-day to all the people, yet all the people would not have believed in him.
Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, II. vii.

As if God, with the broad eye of midday, Clearer looked in at the windows.
Longfellow, tr. of Tegnér's Children of the Lord's Supper.

II. a. Of or pertaining to noon; meridional.

And Titan, tired in the mid-day heat,
With burning eye did hotly overlook them.
Shak., Venus and Adonis, l. 177.

His hour of mid-day rest is nearly over.
Byron, Cain, iii. 1.

midday-flower (mid′dā-flou″ėr), n. See Mesembryanthemum.

middet, a. A Middle English form of mid[1].

middelt, a. and n. A Middle English form of middle.

middelerdt, n. [ME.; also myddelerd, middelerd, midlerd, mydlerde, medlert, etc., < AS. as if middeleard* for middelgeard* (= OS. middilgard = OHG. mittigart, mittilgart, mittilicart, mittingart, mittila gart), < middel, middle, + geard, yard, inclosure. Cf. middenerd, middle-earth.] The earth.

midden (mid′n), n. [Early mod. E. also middin, myddin, medin (in comp.); a corruption (dial. var.) of midding.] 1. A dunghill; a muck-heap; a receptacle for kitchen refuse, ashes, etc. See midding. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.] Specifically—2. A prehistoric muck-heap; a kitchen-midden.

midden-crow (mid′n-krō), n. See crow[2].

middenerdt, n. [ME., also middenard, < AS. middaneard (also mideard) for middangeard (= Icel. miðhgardhr (see midgard) = Goth. midjungards), the 'midyard,' the middle abode, the earth as situated between heaven and hell, < midde, mid, middle, + geard, yard, inclosure (accom. to eard, region, abode). Cf. middelerd, middle-earth.] The earth as the abode of men.

midden-hillt, n. [Early mod. E. medin-hille; < midden + hill[1].] A dunghill.

And like unto great stinkyng mucle medin-hilles, whiche never do pleasure unto the lande or grounde untill their heapes are caste abroade to the profites of many.
Bullein's Dialogue (1573), p. 7. (Halliwell.) middenstead (mid′n-sted), n. [< midden + stead.] The site of a dunghill or muck-heap; a place where dung is stored. [Eng.]

This cause of death and disease is courted by a place that maintains a middenstead and cesspool system of excrement disposal. Lancet, No. 3420, p. 552.

middest†, n. and adv. See midst[1].

middest[1]†, n. See midst[1].

middest[2]† (mid′est), a. Superlative of mid[1]. [Rare.]

Yet the stout Faery mongst the middest crowd Thought all their glorie vaine in knightly vew.
Spenser, F. Q., I. iv. 15.

middint, n. See midden, midding.

middingt (mid′ing), n. [Also, by corruption, middin, midden (see midden); < ME. middinge, middynge, miding, myddyng, < Dan. mödding, an assimilated form of mögdynge, a dung-heap, dunghill, muck-heap, < mög (= Icel. myki, mykr), dung, muck, + dynge, a heap, = Icel. dyngja, a heap, = Sw. dynga, muck, = AS. dung, dung: see muck[1] and dung[1].] A dunghill; a muck-heap.

A fouler myddyng sawe thow never nane
Than a man es with flesche and bane.
Hampole, Prick of Conscience, l. 628.

That middle course to steer,
To cowardice and craft so dear.
Scott, Rokeby, i. 22.

2. Intervening; intermediate.

A matter duly prepared, and made ready beforehand, and now lying in a middle state, between its first rudiments and decline. Bacon, Physical Fables, vii., Expl.

Will, seeking good, finds many middle ends.
Sir J. Davies, Immortal. of the Soul, § 30.

3. In gram.: (a) Intermediate between active and passive: applied to a body of verb-forms of which the office is more or less distinctly reflexive, or denotes the subject as acting on or for or with reference to itself, often answering to an English intransitive verb: as, middle voice, middle ending, middle tense. Such forms, distinguished by their endings, belonged to the original Indo-European verb, and are retained by some of the extant languages, especially Sanskrit and Greek. In Greek the middle voice (ἡ μέση διάθεσις, μεσότης) serves also as passive, except in the future and aorist. (b) Intermediate between smooth (unaspirated) and rough (aspirated): as, a middle (medial) mute. See mute[1], n.—Middle ages. See age.—Middle books†, a course of study intermediate between the Elements of Euclid and the Almagest of Ptolemy.—Middle C. See C.—Middle chest. See chest[1].—Middle class, that class of the people which is socially and conventionally intermediate between the aristocratic class, or nobility, and the laboring class; the untitled community of well-born or wealthy people, made up of landed proprietors, professional men, and merchants: in Great Britain commonly subdivided into upper and lower middle classes. In the United States no class-distinction of this nature exists.

He [Pitt] looked for support not . . . to a strong aristocratical connection, not . . . to the personal favour of the sovereign, but to the middle class of Englishmen.
Macaulay, William Pitt, Earl of Chatham.

4. In logic, same as middle term.—5. In gram., same as middle voice. See I., 3.—Fallacy of no middle, of undistributed middle, of unreal middle. See fallacy.—Middle of the road, an epithet applied, especially in the presidential campaign of 1896, to those members of the Populist party who urged the nomination of a Populist by their party convention and opposed the acceptance of the nominee of the Democratic party: said to be derived from the habit, in some parts of the Southwest, of keeping in the middle of the road, the better to protect one's self from enemies lying in ambush. [U. S. political slang.]—The principle of excluded middle or third, one of the properties of negation, according to which there is no individual that is not included either under any given term or under its negative. It may also be stated by saying that the negative of the negative of any term is included under that term. The converse statement that the negative of the negative of any term includes that term is the principle of contradiction. These two principles, taken together, define negation.

=Syn. 1. Center, Midst, Middle. Center is a precise word, ordinarily applied to circular, globular, or regular bodies: as, the center of a circle, globe, field; but it is used wherever a similar exactness appears to exist: as, the center of a crowd. Midst regards the person or thing as enveloped or surrounded on all sides, especially by that which is close upon him or it, thick or dense: as, in the midst of the forest, the waves, troubles, one's thoughts. Except as thus modified by the idea of envelopment or close environment, the old idea of midst as meaning the middle point (see Gen. i. 6; Josh. vii. 23; 1 Ki. xxii. 35) is quite obsolete. Midst is very often used abstractly or figuratively, center rarely, middle never. Middle is often applied to extent in only one direction: as, the middle of the street, of a block of houses, of a string; it is often less precise than center: compare the center and the middle of a room.

The pride, the market-place, the crown
And center of the potter's trade.
Longfellow, Keramos, l. 66.

Jesus himself stood in the midst of them.
Luke xxiv. 36.

In the dead vast and middle of the night.
Shak., Hamlet, i. 2. 198.

And in my midst of sorrow and heart-grief
To show them feats. Milton, S. A., l. 1338.

In our, your, their midst, in the midst of us, you, them. These phrases have been objected to by some writers on English, but with no good reason.

Lo, in their midst his form was seen.
Montgomery, in Chr. Psalmist, p. 414.

That in their midst, in our midst, &c., are at odds with the "genius" of our language, is an assertion somewhat adventurous. As concerns a substantive, its subjective genitive, universally, and its objective genitive, very often, may be expressed prepositively. Love of God, intending 'love emanating from God,' may be exchanged for God's love: but we also say, Plato's commentators, and the world's end. To come to possessive pronouns, we have no scruples about the objective do his pleasure, sing thy praise, in my absence, on your account, to their discredit, in our despite, his equal, &c., &c.; and with these phrases in our midst is rigidly comparable.
F. Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 50.

midst[1] (midst), adv. [< midst[1], n., itself orig. an adv., in connection with a prep.] In the middle.

On earth, join all ye creatures to extol
Him first, him last, him midst, and without end.
Milton, P. L., v. 165.

midst[2] (midst), prep. [By apheresis from amidst.] Amidst.

They left me midst my enemies.
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., i. 2. 24.

Before the seat supreme; from whence a voice,
From midst a golden cloud, . . . was heard.
Milton, P. L., vi. 28.

midstream (mid'strēm), n. The middle of the stream.

The midstream 's his, I, creeping by the side, Am shouldered off by his impetuous tide.

There is a probability of succeeding about that fellow that is mighty provoking. Sheridan, The Rivals, iv. 3.

migniard†, mignard† (min'yärd), a. [Also miniard; < OF. mignard, F. mignard, with suffix -ard, equiv. to mignon, delicate, pretty, a person beloved: see minion. Cf. mignonette.] Delicate; dainty; pretty.

Love is brought up with those soft migniard handlings,
His pulse lies in his palm.
B. Jonson, Devil is an Ass, i. 2.

migniardise†, migniardize† (min'yär-diz), n. [Also miniardize; < OF. mignardise, F. mignardise, < mignard, delicate: see mignard.] Delicacy; daintiness; kind usage; fondling; wantonness.

Entertain her and her creatures too
With all the migniardise and quaint caresses
You can put on them.
B. Jonson, Staple of News, ii. 1.

migniardise†, migniardize† (min'yär-dīz), v. t. [Also miniardize; < migniardise, n., as if < migniard + -ize.] To render migniard or delicate; soothe.

Wanton spirits that did migniardise, and make the language more dainty and feminine. Howell, Letters, iv. 19.

mignion†, mignon†, n. and v. See minion[1].

mignonette (min-yō-net'), n. [< F. mignonnette, ★the flower so called, dim. of mignon, delicate, pretty, gracefully pleasing: see minion[1].] 1. A well-known plant, Reseda odorata, native in northern Africa. Its racemes of small greenish-white flowers with prominent brown anthers are not showy, but the plant is a universal favorite in gardens on account of its fragrance. In ordinary culture it is an annual, but it is naturally shrubby, and by proper care can be made to thrive for several years in the form of tree-mignonette. The perfume is best extracted by enfleurage.

2. Some other species of the genus Reseda. The white mignonette, R. alba, a tall plant with white scentless blossoms, has sometimes been cultivated. The wild or dyer's mignonette, R. Luteola, is better known as dyer's-weed or yellow-weed. See dyer's-weed.—Jamaica mignonette. See Lawsonia.—Mignonette lace. See lace.—Mignonette netting, a simple kind of netting used for window-curtains. Dict. of Needlework.—Mignonette pepper, in cookery, pepper unground, or ground very coarse.—Mignonette-vine, a plant, Madaria elegans, from Pacific North America.—Tree-mignonette, a plant of any common variety of mignonette trained in an erect form and prevented from flowering early by having the ends of the shoots pinched off.

migraine (mi-grān'), n. ★ Same as megrim.

migrainous (mi-grā'nus), a. [< migraine + -ous.] Pertaining to or caused by megrim: as, migrainous vertigo.

The various forms of headache — dyspepsic, migrainous, neuralgic, cerebral. Lancet, No. 3422, p. 690.

migram†, n. An obsolete form of megrim.

migrant (mī'grant), a. and n. [= Pg. migrante, < L. migran(t-)s, ppr. of migrare, migrate, remove: see migrate.] I. a. Changing place; migratory.

For now desire of migrant change holds sway.
The Century, XXXI. 115.

II. n. 1. One who migrates; a wanderer.

The unhappy migrants may be, if not magnificently, at least hospitably, entertained. Foote, The Minor, Ded.

2. In zoöl., specifically, a migratory animal, as a bird.

These are true migrants; but a number of other birds visit us occasionally, and can only be classed as stragglers. A. R. Wallace, Distribution of Animals, I. 19.

migrate (mī'grāt), v. i.; pret. and pp. migrated, ppr. migrating. [< L. migratus, pp. of migrare, (> It. migrare), move from one place to another, remove, depart, migrate; perhaps connected with meare, go. Cf. emigrate, immigrate.] To pass or remove from one place of residence or habitat to another at a distance, especially from one country or latitude to another; in a general sense, to wander.

Those truly home-bred and genuine sons of the soil who have never migrated beyond the sound of Bow bells.
W. Irving, Sketch-Book, p. 379.

= Syn. Migrate, Emigrate, Immigrate. To migrate is to change one's abode, especially to a distance or to another country, emphasis being laid upon the change, but not upon the place of departure or that of stopping, and the stay being generally not permanent. Emigrate, to migrate from, views the person as leaving his previous abode and making a new home; immigrate, to migrate into, views him as coming to the new place. The Arab migrates; the European coming to America is an emigrant to those whom he leaves, and an immigrant to the Americans. Migrate is applicable to animals; the other terms are generally used of the movements of men.

migration (mī-grā'shon), n. [< F. migration = Pg. migração = It. migrazione, < L. migratio(n-), < migrare, pp. migratus, migrate: see migrate.] 1. The act of migrating; change of residence or habitat; removal or transit from one locality or latitude to another, especially at a distance. Among animals, the most extensive and regular migrations are performed by birds during spring and fall, and in a general way along meridians of longitude, the vernal migration being northward, the autumnal southward. This is ordinary or equatorial migration. In cold and temperate latitudes of the northern hemisphere nearly all insectivorous birds perform migration. Some, as sandpipers, which breed only in high latitudes, may be dispersed during their migration over a great part of the world. Others, as swallows, are noted not only for the extent but for the rapidity and regularity of their movements, their arrival and departure being capable of prediction with considerable accuracy. The migration of many water-fowls is scarcely less notable in the same respects. The helpless eggs and young of birds have many enemies, and the danger to which they are exposed cannot be counterbalanced by an increase in the birth-rate, because a high birth-rate of large and heavy eggs is incompatible with flight. The power of flight permits birds to pass over all barriers of land and water, and to lay their eggs in safe nests, and as all that were not born in safe nests have been exterminated, these facts seem to give a satisfactory explanation of the broader and more general features of the migration of birds. Migrations of mammals are more irregular than those of birds, less definitely related to latitude and longitude, and more obviously dependent upon food-supply: such are the excursions, often in enormous hordes, of various arctic animals, as lemmings and other rodents, reindeer, musk-oxen, foxes, etc. Such movements do not appear to be specially related to reproduction. Many fishes migrate from and back to the sea, ascending rivers to spawn, as is notably the case with anadromous fishes of the salmon and herring families; with eels the case is reversed; with many fishes the catadromous migration is between deeper and shallower, or colder and warmer, salt water. Periodical migration is also marked with certain insects. Thus, Anosia plexippus, the milkweed-butterfly, migrates southward in the fall to hibernate in the pine woods of the southern United States. The faculty which enables or compels animals to migrate has been named the 'instinct of migration"; but the phrase is rather a statement of fact than an explanation of the phenomenon, except in so far as this instinct may be regarded as originating in and being highly developed from the simple necessity of moving about to secure food.

Adventures that beguiled and cheered
Their grave migration. Wordsworth, Excursion, vii.

Our remote forefathers must have made endless earlier migrations as parts of the great Aryan body, as parts of the smaller Teutonic body. But our voyage from the Low-Dutch mainland to the isle of Britain was our first migration as a people. E. A. Freeman, Amer. Lects., p. 31.

2. A number of animals migrating together; the total of the individuals or species which perform any particular migration; also, the time or period occupied in migrating.—3†. Change of place; removal.

Such alterations, transitions, migrations, of the centre of gravity, and elevations of new islands, had actually happened. Woodward, Essay towards a Nat. Hist. of the [Earth. (Latham.)

4†. Residence in a foreign country; banishment.

Wo is me, too too long banished from the Christian world, with such animosity, as if it were the worst of enemies, and meet to be adjudged to a perpetual migration.
Bp. Hall, Invisible World, The Epistle.

Bathic migration, migration of fishes from one depth of water to another; vertical or altitudinal change of habitat in the sea: distinguished from equatorial migration.

The fishes of any region may find water of suitable warmth by moving north or south along the shores of the continent, or by changing to waters of less or greater depth. The former may be called equatorial, the latter bathic migration. Bathic migration is the most common.
Goode, Menhaden.

Equatorial migration, ordinary meridional migration from or toward the equator. See def. 1.

migrationist (mī-grā'shon-ist), n. [< migration + -ist.] One who or that which migrates.

The descendants of previous ages of migrationists.
Jour. Anthrop. Inst., XVII. 130.

migration-station (mī-grā'shon-stā"shon), n. A station or post for observing facts concerning the migration of birds.

Migration-stations now exist in every state and territory of the Union excepting Delaware and Nevada.
Science, IV. 374.

migration-wave (mī-grā'shon-wāv), n. The migration of many birds simultaneously, so that they appear at once at a given place in great numbers in comparison with those that go before or come after; the height of the migration of a given species. Coues.

migrator (mī'grā-tor), n. [< LL. migrator, a wanderer, < L. migrare, pp. migratus, migrate: see migrate.] One who or that which migrates.

These wild migrators. The New Mirror (1843), II. 121.

migratory (mī'grā-tō-ri), a. [= F. migratoire = Sp. It. migratorio; as migrate + -ory.] 1. Given to or characterized by migration; roving or removing from place to place; unsettled: as, the pastoral tribes of uncivilized men are generally migratory; to lead a migratory life.

Yet, sweet Nightingale!
From the warm breeze that bears thee on, alight
At will, and stay thy migratory flight.
Wordsworth, Evening Voluntaries, v.

The same species is often sedentary in one part of Europe, and migratory in another.
A. R. Wallace, Distribution of Animals, I. 20.

2. Pertaining or relating to migration or to a tendency to migrate.

This purpose is sometimes carried on by a sort of migratory instinct, sometimes by a spirit of conquest.
Burke, Abridg. of Eng. Hist., ii. 2.

Migratory animals, those animals whose instincts prompt them to remove from one place to another at the regularly recurring changes of season or of their natural means of subsistence.—Migratory cells, white blood-corpuscles which, by means of the amœboid movement of their protoplasm, penetrate the walls of the blood-vessels and wander independently in the tissues, particularly the connective tissue.—Migratory locust. See locust[1], 1.—Migratory pigeon, the passenger-pigeon. See Ectopistes, and cut under passenger-pigeon.

migrenet, n. A Middle English form of megrim.

Mihelmesset, n. A Middle English form of Michaelmas.

mihrab (mih-räb'), n. [Ar., praying-place.] A niche, or sometimes merely a decorated slab, in one of the interior walls of a mosque, marking the direction of Mecca, to which the faithful ought to turn in prayer. In the niche a copy of the Koran is usually kept, and in front of it the imam stands when he leads the congregation in prayer.

miht†, mihtit. Obsolete forms of might[1], mighty.

mikado (mi-kä'dō), n. [Jap., lit. 'exalted gate' (like the Sublime Porte, applied to the Sultan of Turkey), < mi, exalted, + kado, gate.] The Emperor of Japan, sometimes erroneously spoken of as the spiritual emperor. See shogun.

Mikania (mi-kā'ni-ä), n. [NL. (Willdenow), named after J. C. Mikan, a Bohemian botanist (1769–1844).] An untenable name for Willugbæya, a genus of composite plants of the tribe Eupatorieæ, and subtribe Agerateæ. The principal characteristics are an involucre of four slightly unequal bracts, four-flowered heads which are racemed or paniculed, and pappus with very numerous scabrous bristles arranged in one row. The plants are shrubs or herbs, which are almost always climbing or twining, with opposite leaves, and small white, flesh-colored, or pale-yellowish heads. About 150 species are recognized by modern authors. They are natives of the warmer parts of America, with the exception of one species, which is found in Asia and tropical Africa. Willughbæya scandens, the climbing hempweed, is a high twiner, with cordate somewhat deltoid or hastate leaves and heads of pale flesh-colored flowers in dense cymes, climbing over copses along streams; it ranges through the eastern and southern United States into Mexico and to Brazil. W. Guaco is one of the guaco-plants of tropical America.

mikelt, a. and n. A Middle English form of mickle.

mil (mil), n. [< L. mille, a thousand.] A unit of length used in measuring the diameter of wires, equal to .001 of an inch.—Circular mil, a unit of area used in measuring the areas of cross-sections of wires, equal to .7854 of a square mil.

mil. An abbreviation of military.

milaget (mī'lāj), n. See mileage.

Milanese (mil-an-ēs' or -ēz'), a. and n. [< It. Milanese (< L. Mediolanensis), < Milano, < L. Mediolanum, the city now called Milan.] I. a. Of or belonging to Milan or the people of Milan, a city of northern Italy, or to the province or the former duchy of Milan.

II. n. sing. and pl. A citizen or citizens of Milan.—The Milanese, the territory of the former duchy of Milan in northern Italy.

milarite (mil'ar-īt), n. [< Milar (the Val Milar, in Switzerland, where it was supposed to occur; the true locality, however, has been found to be Val Giuf) + -ite[2].] A silicate of aluminium and calcium, allied in composition to petalite. It occurs in colorless or greenish hexagonal (perhaps pseudohexagonal) prisms.

milcet, v. t. See milse.

milch (milch), a. [< ME. milche, melch, < AS. melc, melce, meolce (= LG. melke = OHG. MHG. melch, G. melk = Icel. milkr, mjólkr), giving milk, < meolc, milk: see milk.] 1. Giving milk; furnishing milk: as, a milch cow: now applied only to domestic animals, and chiefly to cows.

Take two milch kine, on which there hath come no yoke.
1 Sam. vi. 7.

2†. Milky: said of plants.

Hem [plants] beth melch in veer novelles grene
Beth nought to feede.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 99.

3†. Yielding liquid; distilling drops (namely, tears). [Poetical and rare.]

The instant burst of clamour that she made,
Unless things mortal move them not at all,
Would have made milch the burning eyes of heaven,
And passion in the gods. Shak., Hamlet, ii. 2. 540.

milch-wenchf (milch'wench), n. A wet-nurse.

Such exceptions were made against all but one country milch-wench, to whom I was committed, and put to the breast. Steele, Tatler, No. 15.

milch-woman (milch'wum"an), n. A wet-nurse. [Rare.]

We find not above fifty-one to have been starved, excepting helpless Infants at Nurse, . . . being caused . . . by carelessness, ignorance, and infirmity of the Milch-women.
J. Graunt, quoted in Ribton-Turner's Vagrants and [Vagrancy, p. 168.

milchy (mil'chi), a. [< milch + -y[1]. Cf. milky.] 1. Milk-giving; abounding in milk.

There milchy goats come freely to the paile.
Sir T. Hawkins, tr. of Odes of Horace, Epode, xvi. (Davies.)

2. Milky, as an oyster.

mild (mīld), a. [< ME. mild, milde, myld, < AS. milde = OS. mildi = OFries. milde = D. mild = MLG. Otherwise akin to OBulg. milŭ, compassionate, Russ. miluĭ, amiable, kind, Pol. Bohem. mily, dear, = Lith. melas, dear: cf. Gr. μείλιχος, kind, Skt. √ mard, be gracious, pity.] 1. Possessing softness or gentleness of disposition; soft-mannered; kindly disposed; good-tempered.

So gainly a god and of goste mylde!
Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), ii. 728.

O, he was gentle, mild, and virtuous!
Shak., Rich. III., i. 2. 104.

2. Exercising gentleness in conduct or action; not harsh or unfeeling; considerate; conciliatory.

To smooth his fault I should have been more mild.
Shak., Rich. II., i. 3. 240.

3. Marked by softness or kindness; gentle in character, method, or appearance; manifesting or expressing mildness; mollifying; tranquil; placid: as, mild words or manners; a mild rebuke; a mild aspect.

Rushing sound
Of onset ended soon each milder thought.
Milton, P. L., vi 98.

Ah! dearest friend! in whom the gods had joined
The mildest manners with the bravest mind.
Pope, Iliad, xxiv. 963.

4. Gentle or moderate in force, operation, or effect; not harsh or irritating; emollient; bland; genial: as, mild medicine; mild winds; a mild remedy.

The folding gates diffused a silver light,
And with a milder gleam refresh'd the sight.
Addison, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., ii.

5. Moderate in quality or degree; of mitigated force; weak in kind; free from harshness or roughness; hence, not hard to endure, manage, etc.: as, mild fruit; mild dissipation; mild efforts.

This horrour will grow mild, this darkness light.
Milton, P. L., ii. 220.

O! pass more innocent, in infant state,
To the mild limbo of our father Tate.
Pope, Dunciad, i. 238.

Upon a mild declivity of hill.
Byron, Childe Harold, iv. 67.

Modena, Roman, and Sardinian [oak] are what the workmen call milder in character—that is to say, they are easier to work, and a little less hard. Laslett, Timber, p. 84.

6. Hence, new; not having gained the taste that comes by keeping: said of malt liquors: as, mild ale.—7. See the quotation.

A body which can have its form permanently changed without any flaw or break taking place is called mild.
Encyc. Brit., VI. 312.

[Mild forms the first element in a number of compounds of obvious signification: for example, mild-flavored, mild-looking, mild-mannered, mild-spirited, mild-tempered.]—Mild steel. See steel.—To draw it mild. See draw.—Syn. Bland, Soft, etc. (see gentle), tranquil, soothing, pleasant, pacific.

mildt (mīld), n. [< ME. milde (= OHG. miltī = Icel. mildi), mildness; < mild, a.] Mildness; gentleness.

The first element is disputed, the word having early perished in independent use; but no other explanation than that here given is plausible.] 1. A minute parasitic fungus which frequently appears on the leaves, stems, and various other parts of plants or other decaying organic substances as a white frost-like down, or in spots or with various discolorations. The name is more properly restricted to the Erysiphaceæ, or powdery mildews, and the Peronosporaceæ, or downy mildews. The Uredinales, of which Puccinia graminis, the corn-mildew of England, is the type, are more properly rusts. (See rust, Uredinales.) The mildews are among the most destructive fungi known. Plasmopara viticola is the very destructive American downy mildew of the grape, and Uncinula necator, of which the so-called Oïdium Tuckeri is the conidial form, is the powdery mildew of the grape. Phytophthora infestans is the downy mildew of the potato, causing the disease known as potato-rot. Erysiphe polygoni is a very common mildew on various Leguminosæ, Ranunculaceæ, etc. The so-called mildew of linen is produced by a species of Cladosporium. See Cladosporium, Erysipheæ, Peronosporaceæ.

The ordinary or statute mile is equal to 8 furlongs = 320 perches or poles = 1,760 yards = 5,280 feet; it was rendered legal by a statute of the thirty-fifth year of Elizabeth's reign, which prohibited building within three miles of London. This mile was probably intended to be about the length of a minute on the earth's surface, but the perch, of which it is an exact multiple, already existed. The square mile is 6,400 square chains, or 640 acres. The nautical or geographical mile has been variously defined: see phrase below. The medieval English mile (divided into 10 furlongs) was equal to 6,610 feet or 2,015 meters. The old London mile was 5,000 feet. The miles of continental Europe were of the most various lengths, and mostly represented, as it would seem, multiples of some modified Roman mile. The ancient Scottish mile was 1,976 yards = 1.123 English miles; the Irish mile, 2,240 yards = 1.273 English miles (11 Irish miles being 14 English miles). The Welsh mile was nearly 4 miles English. The following table shows the values of some of the principal miles in meters:

Geographical or nautical mile, a mile variously defined as: (1) the mean length of a minute of latitude = 6,082.66 feet; (2) the length of a minute of the meridian corresponding to the radius of curvature of the particular latitude, varying from 6,045.95 feet at the equator to 6,107.85 feet at the poles; and (3) the length of a minute of longitude on the equator = 6,087.15 feet. To remove all uncertainty, the United States Coast Survey has adopted the value of the nautical mile as equal to one sixtieth part of the length of a degree on the great circle of a sphere whose surface is equal to the surface of the earth. This value gives one nautical mile = 6,080.27 feet, which is very nearly the value of the Admiralty knot (6,080 feet) adopted by the British Hydrographic Office.—Three-mile limit, belt, or zone (also called the marine belt), in international law, that part of the margin of the high seas which is within the jurisdiction of the nation possessing the coast, originally determined by the circumstance that, at the time this limit became generally recognized, a marine league approximated fairly to the distance at which cannon on the shore would serve to command the water. 1 Whart. Dig. Int. Law, 114, § 32.

mileage (mī′lāj), n. [Formerly also milage; < mile + -age.] 1. Length, extent, or distance in miles; the total or aggregate number of miles of way made, used, or traversed: as, the mileage of highways or waterways in a country; the mileage of a railroad-line; the mileage of a year's traffic on a railroad, or of travel through a country.—2. An allowance or compensation for travel or conveyance reckoned by the mile; especially, payment allowed to a public functionary for the expenses of travel in the discharge of his duties according to the number of miles passed over: as, the mileage of a sheriff, circuit judge, or member of Congress or of a legislature.

> Private travellers can obtain permission to make use of [post-horses] on payment of small mileage-dues.
> H. O. Forbes, Eastern Archipelago, p. 52.

mile-post (mīl′pōst), n. A post set up to mark distance by miles along a highway or other line of travel.

Milesia (mī-lē′si-ä), n. [NL.] A genus of dipterous insects of the family Syrphidæ, founded by Latreille in 1805. It is composed of large, robust, nearly naked species, black or yellowish-brown, with yellowish thoracic and abdominal markings. The genus is mostly developed in southeastern Asia and the East Indian archipelago; but two European species are known, and one, M. ornata, is North American.

Ornate Syrphid (Milesia ornata).

Milesian[1] (mi-lē′shian), a. and n. [< L. Milesius, < Gr. Μίλήσιος, of or pertaining to Miletus, < Μίλητος, > L. Miletus, Miletus: see def.] I. a. Pertaining to Miletus, an ancient city of Caria, on the Ionic coast of Asia Minor, or to its inhabitants.

II. n. A native or an inhabitant of the ancient Ionic city of Miletus in Asia Minor.

Milesian[2] (mi-lē′shian or -zhan), a. and n. [After Milesian[1], < Milesius, a fabulous king of Spain.] I. a. Pertaining to Ireland or the Irish race. See II.

II. n. A native of Ireland; a member of the Irish race: so called from the tradition of an ancient conquest and reorganization of the country by two sons of Milesius, a fabulous king of Spain. It is supposed that the legendary race of Milesians were the same as the Scots who conquered Ireland in prehistoric times.

mile-stone (mīl′stōn), n. A stone or pillar set up along a highway or other line of travel to mark distance in miles.

> The second mile-stone fronts the garden gate.
> Cowper, Retirement, l. 490.

mileway† (mīl′wā), n. 1. A measure of time: the third part of an hour, or twenty minutes.—2. Five degrees of angular measurement.

> As I have said, 5 of thise degrees maken a milewey, & 3 milewey maken an howre. Chaucer, Astrolabe, i. § 16.

milfoil (mil′foil), n. [< ME. milfoil, < OF. milfoil, mirfuel, mierfuel, millefueil, m., millefueille, F. millefeuille, f., = Pg. milfolhas = It. millefoglie, millefoglio, < L. millefolium, neut., millefolia, f., milfoil, lit. (like Gr. χιλιόφυλλος, milfoil), 'thousand leaves,' so called from the abundance of its leaves, < mille, a thousand, + folium, leaf: see mill[2] and foil[1]. Cf. trefoil, quatrefoil, cinquefoil, etc.] A composite herb, Achillea Millefolium, also called yarrow. It is distributed throughout the northern hemisphere, and is found on roadsides, in dry pastures, etc. It is a grayish-green plant, a foot or two high, the leaves bipinnate and very finely divided, the heads in a crowded corymb, their short rays white, sometimes rose-colored. Medicinally the milfoil is a mild aromatic tonic and astringent. A. moschata, the musk-milfoil, a native of the mountains of central and southern Europe, is cultivated in Switzerland as a food for cattle. The name is sometimes extended to other plants of the genus.—Water-milfoil, one of various water-plants with finely dissected leaves, chiefly of the genus Myriophyllum. The hooded water-milfoil is the bladderwort, Utricularia vulgaris.

milia†, n. [L., pl. of milium: see Milium.] Millet; millet-seed.

> They stamp their milia as we do spice, . . . temper with fresh water and salt, and make rolls thereof.
> Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 650.

miliar†, n. [< ME. miliaire, < L. miliarium (see def.).] A tall narrow vessel for drawing and warming water: used in baths: especially in Roman antiquities.

> A myliair of lede, the bothom brasse
> Anende the feetes sette it so withoute
> The fourneis, and the fire ther undre passe.
> Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 40.

★miliaria (mil-i-ā′ri-ä), n. [NL., < L. miliaria, fem. of miliarius, belonging to millet: see miliary.] 1. In pathol., miliary fever.—2. In ornith., an old name of the corn-bunting, Emberiza miliaria, as that of a bird which feeds upon millet. It is taken by some authors as a generic name of this bunting and its near relatives.

miliary (mil′i-ā-ri), a. [= F. miliaire = Sp. Pg. miliar = It. miliare, < L. miliarius, of or belonging to millet, < milium, millet: see millet.] Resembling millet-seeds, especially in size (about one or two millimeters in diameter); accompanied by formations of this size: as, miliary glands; miliary tuberculosis; miliary fever. See gland, tuberculosis, fever.

milice† (mi-lēs′), n. [< F. milice, militia: see militia.] Militia, in a general sense.

> The two-and-twentieth of the prince's age is the time assigned by their constitutions for his entering upon the publick charges of their milice.
> Sir W. Temple, War in the Low Countries.

Miliobatis, n. See Myliobatis.

Miliola (mi-li′ō-lä), n. [NL., < L. milium, millet: see Milium.] A genus of imperforate foraminifers, typical of the family Miliolidæ. The minute fossil tests or shells occur in immense numbers in some strata, being the chief constituent of the miliolite limestone of the Paris basin, for example.

Miliolidæ (mil-i-ol′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Miliola + -idæ.] A family of foraminiferous rhizopods, typified by the genus Miliola. They have the test imperforate, normally calcareous and porcelaneous, sometimes incrusted with sand, under starved conditions (for example in brackish water) becoming chitinous or chitino-arenaceous, and at abyssal depths occasionally consisting of a thin, homogenous, imperforate silicious film.

milioliform (mil-i-ol′i-fôrm), a. [< NL. Miliola + L. forma, form.] Same as milioline.

milioline (mil′i-ō-lin), a. [< NL. Miliola + -ine[2].] Pertaining to, characteristic of, or resembling the Miliolidæ or a subfamily Miliolinæ: as, a milioline chamber or character.

> Abounding near the shores of almost every sea are some forms of the Milioline type, so named from the resemblance of some of their minute fossilized forms to millet-seeds.
> W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 462.

miliolite (mil′i-ō-līt), a. and n. [< NL. Miliola + -ite[2].] I. a. Miliolitic.

II. n. A fossil milioline foraminifer.

miliolitic (mil′i-ō-lit′ik), a. [< miliolite + -ic.] Of or pertaining to miliolites; containing or consisting of miliolites: as, miliolitic chalk.

Miliolite.

milit. An abbreviation of military.

militancy (mil′i-tan-si), n. [< militan(t) + -cy.] The condition of being militant; a state of warfare or conflict.

All humane life, especially the active part, is constituted in a state of continual militancy.
W. Montague, Devoute Essays, I. x. 7.

It is not uncheering to look back upon a time when the nation [England] was in a normal condition of militancy against social injustice. Froude, Sketches, p. 172.

militant (mil'i-tant), a. [= F. militant = Sp. Pg. It. militante, < L. militan(t-)s, ppr. of militare, serve as a soldier: see militate.] 1. Fighting; warring; engaged in warfare; pertaining to warfare or conflict.

At which command the powers militant
. . . moved on
In silence. Milton, P. L., vi. 61.

2. Having a combative character or tendency; warlike.

The militant nature of legal protection is seen in the fact that . . . it is a replacing of individual armed force by the armed force of the state, always in reserve if not exercised. H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 522.

Church militant. See church.

militantly (mil'i-tant-li), adv. In a militant or warlike manner.

militar† (mil'i-tär), a. [< L. militaris: see military.] Military.

Although he were a prince in militar vertue approved.
Bacon, Hist. Hen. VII.

Instruct the noble English heirs
In politique and militar affairs.
B. Jonson, Underwoods, lxiii.

militarily (mil'i-tā-ri-li), adv. In a military or warlike manner; by military force; from a military point of view.

Austria is at this moment, under the treaty [of 1856], militarily occupying two provinces of Turkey in order to reform them. N. A. Rev., CXXVII. 395.

militarism (mil'i-tā-rizm), n. [< F. militarisme = Sp. militarismo; as militar, militar-y, + -ism.] The military spirit; addiction to war or military practices; the maintenance of national power by means of standing armies.

The principles of Port Royal found some supporters . . . before monarchism and militarism had crushed the life out of the nation. Encyc. Brit., VII. 675.

Monarchy, aristocracy, militarism we could not have if we would, we would not have if we could.
A. D. White, Century's Message, p. 19.

Who can say that the democracy will not in some sudden impulse of economy or aversion to militarism prematurely reduce the army and navy, and lay the Empire open to aggression from every side?
Nineteenth Century, XX. 311.

militarist (mil'i-tā-rist), n. [< militar, militar-y, + -ist.] 1. One devoted to military affairs; one proficient in the art of war.

You're deceived, my lord; this is Monsieur Parolles, the gallant militarist—that was his own phrase—that had the whole theoric of war in the knot of his scarf, and the practice in the chape of his dagger.
Shak., All's Well, iv. 3. 161.

2. One who is in favor of a standing army; one who advocates a warlike policy.

military (mil'i-tā-ri), a. and n. [Formerly also militar; = F. militaire = Sp. Pg. militar = It. militare, < L. militaris, rarely militarius, of or belonging to soldiers or war, warlike, < miles (milit-), OL. meiles, a soldier.] I. a. 1. Having the position or character of a soldier; pertaining to soldiers; suitable to, characteristic of, or performed by soldiers; soldierly: as, a military man; a military deportment or disposition.

He will maintain his argument as well as any military man in the world. Shak., Hen. V., iii. 2. 86.

Was this your discipline and faith engaged,
Your military obedience? Milton, P. L., iv. 955.

Though courageous in brawls and duels, he knew nothing of military duty. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vi.

2. Relating or pertaining to war, to the art of war, or to an armed force; adapted to or connected with a state of war; martial; warlike; belligerent: as, the military art; military glory; military history; military equipage; a military expedition. The military resources of a country include both army and navy, and the phrase military office has been legally construed to apply to both; but in ordinary language military is used only in relation to the land-forces, as distinguished from the naval or sea forces.

Both were ambitious of military glory, and showed capacity for attaining it. Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 25.

A military force, whether intended to operate on land or at sea, exists primarily for purposes of war.
J. R. Soley, Blockade and Cruisers, p. 231.

3. Warlike in method or practice; having relation to the usages or purposes of war; connected with or dependent upon the use of armed force: opposed to civil: as, a military despotism; military government; a military execution.

Abbreviated mil., milit.

Bureau of Military Justice. See bureau.—Military architecture. See architecture.—Military art, the art of war. (a) Tactical, relating to the order and arrangement to be observed in the management of an army when it is to march, to engage an enemy, or to be encamped. (b) Technical, including the composition, fabrication, and application of warlike machines, and the practice of military engineering in the erection of offensive and defensive works for the protection of an army, a city, or a country. This branch also comprises the topographical surveys, the building of pontoon and other bridges, the projection and construction of roads, telegraph-lines, railroads, etc., necessary to the operations of an army in the field.—Military band. See band[3].—Military ceremonies. See ceremony.—Military commission. See commission.—Military courts, the courts of chivalry and courts martial.—Military drum, the side-drum or snare-drum.—Military engineering, fever, etc. See the nouns.—Military feuds. See feud[2].—Military Knight of Windsor. Same as Windsor Knight (which see, under knight).—Military law, the body of rules and ordinances prescribed by competent authority for the government of the military state, considered as a distinct community. (Bishop.) Military law in the United States consists of the Rules and Articles of War, and other statutory provisions for the government of persons subject to military control, to which may be added the unwritten or common law derived from the usage and custom of military service. See law[1], and martial law (under martial).—Military mast. See mast[1].—Military music, martial music, suitable for a military band and for use in connection with military evolutions.—Military offenses, offenses which are cognizable by a court martial.—Military system, the rules, regulations, forms, etc., prescribed for the organization and administration of an army in the field or in garrison or camp.—Military tenure, a tenure of land on condition of performing military service.—Military testament, in Rom. law, a nuncupative will, by which a soldier might dispose of his goods without the forms and solemnities which the law requires in other cases.—Statute of military tenures, an English statute of 1660, which abolished knights' service and some of the abuses and exactions of military tenures.—Syn. Warlike, etc. See martial.

II. n. Soldiers generally; soldiery; officers of the army: commonly with the definite article: as, the occasion was enlivened by the presence of the military.

My lord going to the "Trumpet," in the Cockpit, Whitehall, an house used by the military in his time as a young man. Thackeray, Henry Esmond, i. 14.

militate (mil'i-tāt), v. i.; pret. and pp. militated, ppr. militating. [< L. militatus, pp. of militare, (> It. militare = Pg. Sp. militar = F. militer), be a soldier, < miles (milit-), a soldier: see military.] 1. To be in conflict or at variance; come into collision.

Against everything which militated with the doctrines or ceremonies of his church, he hurled his anathemas.
Whipple, Ess. and Rev., II. 90.

Hence—2. To stand in array; have weight or force, as in determining anything: followed by against, and permissibly by in favor of: as, these facts militate against (or in favor of) your theory.

Multiplicity of talents has too often militated against the due fulfilment of some special bent.
W. Sharp, D. G. Rossetti, p. 1.

militation (mil-i-tā'shon), n. [< L. as if militatio(n-)*, < militare, pp. militatus, serve as a soldier: see militate.] A fighting; warfare; state of conflict.

Repentance doth not cut down sin at a blow; no, it is a constant Militation, & course of mortification.
The Morning Exercise Methodized, p. 374.

★militia (mi-lish'ä), n. [Formerly milice, < F. milice = Sp. Pg. milicia = It. milizia, < L. militia, military service, the soldiery, < miles (milit-), a soldier.] 1†. Military service; warfare.

Another kind of militia I had then theirs. Baxter.

2. Soldiery; militants collectively. [Rare.]

Know then, unnumber'd spirits round thee fly,
The light militia of the lower sky.
Pope, R. of the L., i. 42.

3. In the U. S., all able-bodied men over 18 and less than 45 years of age amenable to military service: divided into organized militia, or the National Guard, and reserve militia.

It has been necessary to call into service, not only volunteers, but also portions of the militia of the States by draft. Lincoln, in Raymond, p. 348.

The regular army is supported and controlled by the federal government, but each state maintains its own militia, which it is bound to use in case of internal disturbance before calling upon the central government for aid. In time of war, however, these militias come under the control of the central government.
J. Fiske, Amer. Pol. Ideas, p. 98.

4. A body of men enrolled and drilled according to military law, as an armed force, but not as regular soldiers, and called out in emergency for actual service and periodically for drill and exercise. The feudal array of the middle ages was properly a militia, and the first proceeding of modern warfare consisted in the gradual adoption of permanent and regular troops, which superseded the militia.

militiaman (mi-lish'ä-man), n.; pl. militiamen (-men). One who belongs to the organized and armed militia.

militiate† (mi-lish'i-āt), v. i. [< militia + -ate[2]. Cf. militate.] 1. To levy or raise troops; maintain a standing army.

We continue to militiate, and to raise light troops.
Walpole, To Mann, Nov. 16, 1759. (Davies.)

2. To fight as a soldier.

The militiating spirits of my country.
Sterne, Tristram Shandy, III. 177. (Davies.)

Milium (mil'i-um), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < L. milium, millet: see millet.] 1. A genus of grasses of the tribe Agrostideæ and the subtribe Stipeæ, characterized by an ovoid glume, rigid or hardened about the caryopsis, and an awnless flowering glume. They are annuals or perennials, with flat leaves and a compound panicle of one-flowered spikelets. There are 5 or 6 species, natives of Europe, temperate Asia, and North America. The genus bears the common name of millet-grass. M. effusum, widely spread through the northern hemisphere, is a tall handsome grass which thrives in dense shade. Its herbage is relished by cattle, and its seed by birds.

They haue the seed of Millium in great abundance.
Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 104.

2. [l. c.] In pathol., an affection of the sebaceous glands, caused by retention of their secretion in the form of pearly or yellowish-white little globular bodies embedded in the skin and projecting slightly above its surface.

Milium is a minute white tumour, about the size of a millet seed, . . . which is mostly situated at or near the free edge of the lid. J. S. Wells, Dis. of Eye, p. 682.

Miliusa (mil-i-ū'sä), n. [NL. (Leschenault, 1832), named after J. Milius Votolinas, a horticultural writer of the 16th century.] A genus of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants of the family Anonaceæ, the custard-apple family, type of the tribe Miliuseæ. It is characterized by having the outside petals small, and the interior ones much larger, flat, and converging at the apex. About fourteen species are known, natives of Asia and tropical Australia. They are low or medium-sized trees, with flowers almost always axillary, either solitary or in clusters, and with the petals often transparent.

Miliuseæ (mil-i-ū'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Hooker and Thompson, 1855), < Miliusa + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the family Anonaceæ, typified by the genus Miliusa. It is characterized by stamens which are loosely imbricated, and with the connective slightly or not at all dilated beyond the conspicuous dorsal cells of the anthers. There are 13 genera and about 129 species, all indigenous to the tropics.

★milk (milk), n. [< ME. milk, mylk, melk, mulc, < AS. meolc, meoluc (not milc*) = OFries. melok = D. melk = MLG. LG. melk = OHG. miluh, MHG. milich, milch, G. milch = Icel. mjölk = Sw. mjölk = Dan. melk = Goth. miluks, milk; cf. Ir. melg = OBulg. mleko = Pol. W. llaeth, L. lac(t-) = Gr. γάλα (γαλακτ-), milk, of diff. origin: see lactate, etc., galaxy, etc.); derived from a common Indo-Eur. verb, namely, AS. melcan (pret. mealc, pp. molcen) = D. melken = MLG. LG. melken = OHG. melchan, MHG. melchen, melken, G. melken = Goth. milkan* (not recorded), a strong verb partly displaced by, or merged in, a later weak verb, E. milk = OFries. melka = Icel. mjölka, etc., depending on the noun; cf. OBulg. mlìza, mlesti, etc., = Russ. melzitĭ = Lith. milsti = L. mulgere = Gr. ἀμέλγειν, milk, = Skt. √marj = Zend √marez, stroke, rub. Hence milk, v., and milch, a.] 1. A white or bluish-white liquid secreted by the mammary glands of the females of the class Mammalia, and drawn from their breasts for the nourishment of their young. It is opaque, with a slight peculiar odor and a bland sweetish taste. Its chemical constituents in different mammals are qualitatively alike, but quantitatively vary much, not only in different species, but also in different individuals, or even at different times in the same individual. The amount of water varies from about 80 to 90 per cent., the residue being composed of proteids (casein, lactoglobulin, and lactalbumin), fat, milk-sugar, and certain salts, chiefly phosphates. Under the microscope it appears as a clear transparent fluid, in which a large number of minute globules are suspended. When allowed to rest, these globules rise to the surface, forming a yellowish stratum, the cream, which consists mainly of the fat, mixed with some casein, and retaining some serum. In the cow about 4 per cent. of the milk is cream, in the human female less, in the mare scarcely more than 1 per cent. By churning, the globules unite to form butter, leaving the buttermilk, which is essentially a solution of milk-sugar, with the salts and some casein and butter. The milk from which cream is separated is skimmed milk, which when left to itself (if not too cold) develops, from the action of a certain bacterium, lactic acid, which separates the casein in a coagulated condition called curds; the same effect is produced by some other acids, and by rennet, the prepared inner membrane of the stomach of a calf. The liquid separated from the coagulum is called whey, and contains chiefly milk-sugar and some salts. Cheese is prepared by coagulating milk with rennet, allowing the whey to separate, and adding salt to the curd. The specific gravity of both cow's and human milk is about 1.030. Human milk is always alkaline, cow's milk either alkaline or acid, while the milk of carnivora is always acid. Milk represents a complete or typical food, in which all the constituents necessary for maintaining the life and growth of the body are present. In rare instances milk, in greater or less abundance, is secreted by the mammary glands of the adult human male.

Milke before wine, I would twere mine;
Milke taken after, is poisons daughter.
Quoted in Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), Index, p. 100.

She bath'd her body many a time
In fountains fill'd with milk.
Queen Eleanor's Fall (Child's Ballads, VII. 297).

2. Anything resembling milk in appearance, taste, etc., as the juice of the cocoanut and the sap of certain plants (see latex).

Thoo [squills] that in hilles growe or places colde
Have licel mylk.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 124.

At the time when the contents of the berry [wheat] are in the condition technically known as milk.
Ure, Dict., IV. 153.

3. The spat before it is discharged from an oyster.—4. A slight cloudy opacity occurring in some diamonds.

Cloudy imperfections known in the trade as "milk" or "salt." Ure, Dict., II. 24.

Blue milk. (a) Milk deprived of its cream; skimmed milk. It has a faint bluish tinge. [Colloq.] (b) Milk which has undergone a special fermentation caused by a microbe, Pseudomonas syncyanea, which causes it to assume a blue color.—Bristol milk, a mixed beverage of which sherry is the chief ingredient.

Plenty of brave wine, and above all Bristol milk.
Pepys, Diary.

A rich brewage made of the best Spanish wine, and celebrated over the whole kingdom as Bristol milk.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., iii.

Condensed milk, milk preserved by the addition of sugar with or without other ingredients, and subsequent reduction by evaporation to a half or a fourth of its bulk, sometimes even to dryness.—Fairy's milk, a peculiar milky secretion produced by the mammary glands of infants for some days after birth.—In milk, in the milk, milky; containing the spat, as oysters; containing a white juice, as wheat before the grains harden.—Milk of almonds, an emulsion prepared by rubbing blanched almonds with gum arabic, sugar, and water.—Milk of lime, slaked lime suspended in water: so called as resembling milk in appearance.—Milk of sulphur, precipitated sulphur.—Pigeon's milk, a milky or curdy secretion of the crop of pigeons of both sexes, upon which they feed their young for some time by disgorging or regurgitating it into their mouths.—Red milk, milk which has assumed a red color from the growth of a chromogenic microbe, Bacterium erythrogenes.—Sugar of milk, Same as lactose.—Whole milk, milk with all its cream. [Eng.]—Yellow milk, milk which has assumed a yellow color, due to a coloring matter produced by a microbe, Bacillus synxanthus.

★milk (milk), v. t. [< ME. milken, < AS. meolcian = OFries. melka (= Icel. mjölka = Sw. mjölka = Dan. malke), draw milk, give milk, < meolc, milk: see milk, n., where an earlier form of the verb is mentioned.] 1. To press or draw milk from the breasts or udders of: as, to milk a cow.

The Iew may not milke his cattell, nor eate of the milke when he hath procured a Christian to milke them, except he first buy it, but at his owne price.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 205.

Thou wilt not find my shepherdesses idly piping on oaten reeds, but milking the kine.
Gay, Shepherd's Week, Proeme.

2†. To suck.

I have given suck, and know
How tender 'tis to love the babe that milks me.
Shak., Macbeth, i. 7. 55.

3. Figuratively, to drain the contents or the strength from; exhaust gradually: as, to milk a friend's purse; the soil has been milked of its fertility. [Obsolete or colloq.]

And to ayd the kynge in hys right must the commons be milked till they bleede agayne. Tyndale, Works, p. 365.

This three year I have milked their hopes.
B. Jonson, Volpone, i. 1.

4. In racing slang, to bet against, as an owner against his horse when the horse is to be withdrawn, or cannot win, or is not to be allowed to win.—5. In teleg., to draw part of the current from (a wire) through an instrument without cutting the wire; read a message by placing an induction apparatus close to (the wire).

The rapidity and simplicity of the means by which a wire could be milked without being cut or put out of circuit struck the whole of the party.
Prescott, Elect. Invent., p. 108.

6†. To supply with milk; feed with milk.

Norished was Terry fuetly to ryght
That she full ofte hym raid [dressed] and dight, Chaufed, milked, and rechaufed again.
Rom. of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), l. 4024.

For lyche a moder she can cherishe,
And mylken as doth a norys. Rom. of the Rose.

milk-abscess (milk'ab″ses), n. An abscess of the female breast arising during lactation.

milk-and-water (milk'and-wâ'tėr), a. Insipid, like milk diluted with water; hence, weak; characterless; wishy-washy. [Colloq.]

What slays a veteran may well lay a milk-and-water bourgeois low. C. Reade, Cloister and Hearth, xxvi.

milk-blotch (milk'bloch), n. An eruption of numerous minute vesicles on a red surface, on the faces of infants, in some cases extending to the neck and breast. The vesicles break, and discharge a viscid fluid, which becomes incrusted in yellowish or greenish scabs, forming, as they extend, a kind of mask. It is a form of vesicular eczema. Also called milk-crust or milk-scab.

milk-can (milk'kan), n. A large can for carrying milk to market or to customers.

milk-car (milk'kär), n. A special form of box freight-car with end platforms and passenger-car springs, used for the transportation of milk in cans. [U. S.]

milk-cooler (milk'kö″lėr), n. An apparatus for cooling fresh milk by means of ice or cold water.

milk-crust (milk'krust), n. Same as milk-blotch.

milk-cure (milk'kūr), n. A system of medical treatment by means of a diet of milk.

milk-damet (milk'dām), n. A wet-nurse; a foster-mother.

Then her owne mylckdame in byrth soyl was breathles abyding. Stanihurst, Æneid, iv. 681.

milk-dentition (milk'den-tish″ọn), n. See dentition.

milk-duct (milk'dukt), n. The duct, or any one of several ducts, which conveys milk from the place of its secretion in the mammary gland through the nipple to the exterior; a galactophorous duct.

milken (mil'kn), a. [< ME. milken (?), < AS. mylcen*, milcen, of milk, < meolc, milk: see milk, n., and *-en*².] 1. Consisting of milk. [Rare.]

The remedies are to be proposed from a constant course of the Milken diet. Sir W. Temple.

2. Milky; resembling milk.

She having with a pretty paleness, which did leave milken lines upon her rosy cheeks, paid a little duty to human fear. Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, iv.

milken-wayt (mil'kn-wā), n. Same as Milky Way.

I said thine eyes were stars, thy breasts the milken-way.
Sir P. Sidney (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 564).

milker (mil'kėr), n. 1. One who milks.

His kine, with swelling udders, ready stand,
And, lowing for the pail, invite the milker's hand.
Dryden, tr. of Virgil's Georgics, ii. 764.

2. An apparatus for milking cows mechanically.—3. A cow or other animal that gives milk: usually with a qualifying term. [Colloq.]

Inferior cows will require to be weeded out, and the utmost attention must be paid to breeding good milkers.
Quarterly Rev., CXLV. 323.

milk-factory (milk'fak″tọ-ri), n. See the quotation.

Factories, as explained by Canon Bagot, in a paper read at the recent Dairy Conference in Ireland, are of three kinds, distinguished by him as milk factories, creameries, and butter factories. In the milk factories which are becoming common in the south of Ireland, the whole milk is purchased from the farmers, the price paid lately being 4d. to 4½d. a gallon, and the separated milk, after the cream has been extracted by the mechanical cream separator, is taken back by the farmers, at 1d. to 2d. a gallon, for the feeding of pigs. Quarterly Rev., CXLV. 306.

milk-fat, n. See milk-vat.

milk-fever (milk'fē″vėr), n. A name applied to light feverish attacks coming on shortly after childbirth, and coinciding more or less with the beginning of lactation.

★milk-fish (milk'fish), n. A clupeoid fish, Chanos chanos. See Chanos.

milkful (milk'fụl), a. [< milk, n., + -ful.] Abounding or overflowing with milk; fertile; fruitful.

O Milk-full Vales, with hundred Brooks indented.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Decay.

milk-glass (milk'glàs), n. Same as cryolite glass (which see, under cryolite).

milk-globule (milk'glob″ūl), n. One of the numerous small highly refractive oil-globules floating in the milk-plasma. The white color and opacity of milk are due to the milk-globules, which reflect the light. They consist of fat or butter, surrounded by a very thin layer of albumin.

milk-hedge (milk'hej), n. A shrub or small tree, Euphorbia Tirucalli, native in Africa, and naturalized in parts of India. It branches densely, is perennially green, and is much used for hedges. Its wood, which is very hard, and durable when not exposed to wet, is valuable for gunpowder-charcoal. Its milky juice is an Indian specific for syphilis.

milk-house (milk'hous), n. A dairy.

Who would not thinke it a ridiculous thing to see a lady in her milke-house with a velvet gown?
Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, iii. 24.

milkily (mil'ki-li), adv. With a milky appearance; after the manner of milk.

milkiness (mil'ki-nes), n. 1. The state of being milky, or of resembling milk in quality or appearance.

All nebulæ naturally seemed to him (Herschel) to be but stellar clusters, so distant as to cause the individual stars to disappear in a general milkiness or nebulosity.
Newcomb and Holden, Astron., p. 458.

Hence—2. Blandness; mildness; softness.

Would I could share the balmy, even temper,
And milkiness of blood. Dryden, Cleomenes, i. 1.

My new companion poured out his complaints in no milkiness of mood. T. C. Grattan.

★milking (mil'king), n. [Verbal n. of milk, v.] 1. The act of drawing milk.—2. The milk so obtained at one time.—3. In racing slang, the keeping of a horse a favorite, at short odds, for a race in which he has no chance, or from which he is to be withdrawn, with the object of betting against him. Kirk's Guide to the Turf.

Swiss Milking-stool, Canton of Berne.

milking-stool (mil'king-stöl), n. A stool used to sit on while milking a cow. The stool in common use has three legs. In Switzerland one is used consisting of a disk which can be strapped to the person, with a sharpened or pointed prop about a foot long.

milking-time (mil'king-tīm), n. The time of day, especially about sunset, at which cows or other milch animals are usually milked.

I think it is now about milking-time; and yonder they be at it. I. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 170.

milking-tube (mil'king-tūb), n. A perforated tube of silver which is inserted in the milk-duct of a cow's teat, to overcome the muscular contraction, and thus facilitate the flow of milk.

milk-kinship (milk'kin″ship), n. The kinship arising from adoption or fostering.

We find among the Arabs a feeling about milk-kinship so well established that Mohammed's law of forbidden degrees gives it all the effects of blood-relationship as a bar to marriage. W. R. Smith, Kinship and Marriage, p 149.

milk-ky (milk'kī'), n. pl. Milch cows. [Scotch.]

And I'll gi' thee ane o my best milk-ky,
To maintain thy wife and children three.
Dick o' the Cow (Child's Ballads, VI. 78).

milk-leg (milk'leg), n. Same as phlegmasia dolens. See phlegmasia.

milkless (milk'les), a. [< milk, n., + -less.] Without milk; specifically, in bot., not supplied with or producing milk, a character of high importance in agaricinous fungi.

Gills [of Russula] nearly equal, milkless, rigid, brittle, with an acute edge.
Cooke, Handbook of Brit. Fungi, p. 217.

milk-livered (milk'liv″ėrd), a. Timid; cowardly; white-livered.

Milk-liver'd man,
That bear'st a cheek for blows, a head for wrongs.
Shak., Lear, iv. 2. 50.

milk-madget (milk'maj), n. A milkmaid.

Shall I now, lyke a castaway milckmadge,
On mye woers formoure be fawning?
Stanihurst, Æneid, iv. 572. (Davies.)

milkmaid (milk'mād), n. A woman who milks cows or is employed in a dairy.

The milkmaid singeth blithe.
Milton, L'Allegro, l. 65.

milkman (milk'man), n.; pl. milkmen (-men). A man who sells milk; especially, one who goes from door to door serving milk to families.

milk-meat (milk'mēt), n. Food consisting of or made with milk, as cheese, butter, etc.

The help which fasting does to prayer cannot be served by changing flesh into fish, or milk-meats into dry diet.
Jer. Taylor, Holy Living, iv. 5.

Abstaining from flesh and milk-meats on Friday.
N. Bailey, tr. of Colloquies of Erasmus, p. 274.

milk-mirror (milk'mir″ọr), n. Certain marks on the udder and perineum of the cow, consisting of spots and lines on which the hair grows upward (the hair on other parts growing downward), supposed to indicate, by their form, size, and direction, the characters of the cow as regards both the quantity and the quality of her milk.

milk-mite (milk'mīt), n. See cheese-mite.

milk-molar (milk'mō″lär), n. One of the grinders or back teeth of the milk-dentition, corresponding to and replaced by a premolar of the permanent dentition.

milk-nurse (milk'nėrs), n. A wet-nurse.

> My mither was a gude milk-nurse,
> And a gude nourice was she.
> Earl Richard (Child's Ballads, III. 396).

milk-pail (milk'pāl), n. A pail for holding milk; specifically, the wooden or tin vessel commonly used in milking.

> Very fractious, and apt to kick over the milk-pail.
> Quarterly Rev., CLXV. 149.

milk-pan (milk'pan), n. A large shallow pan in which milk is kept to allow the cream to rise.

milk-pap (milk'pap), n. A teat or nipple. [Rare.]

> Let not the virgin's cheek
> Make soft thy trenchant sword; for those milk paps,
> That through the window-bars bore at men's eyes,
> Are not within the leaf of pity writ.
> Shak., T. of A., iv. 3. 115.

milk-parsley (milk'pärs″li), n. A European umbelliferous plant, Peucedanum palustre, abounding with an acrid milky juice; also, Selinum caruifolium of the same family, sometimes distinguished as caraway-leafed milk-parsley.

milk-pea (milk'pē), n. See Galactia, 2.

milk-plasma (milk'plaz″mą), n. A clear slightly opalescent fluid obtained by filtering milk through clay filters or membranes.

milk-porridge (milk'por'ij), n. Porridge made with milk instead of water.

milk-pump (milk'pump), n. An instrument for drawing milk from the breasts; a breast-pump.

milk-punch (milk'punch'), n. A drink made of milk, spirits (usually brandy, rum, or whisky), sugar, and nutmeg.

> "I don't know," replied Mr. Pickwick, with equal carelessness; "it smells, I think, like milk-punch."
> Dickens, Pickwick, i.

milk-quartz (milk'kwârts'), n. A variety of quartz of a milk-white color. Also called milky quartz.

milk-scab (milk'skab), n. Same as milk-blotch.

milk-selet, n. [ME.] A milk-pail.

> Multrale, a mylk sele. Nominale MS. (Halliwell.) milk-shake (milk'shāk'), n. A beverage composed of milk and carbonated water with the addition of a flavoring, mixed by being vigorously shaken up and down by hand or by a small machine. [Recent, U. S.]

milk-sick (milk'sik), a. Infected with milk-sickness. [Colloq.]

> Trembles and milk-sickness were generally hard to locate by strangers in the particular "settlement," as a "milk-sick farm" was not desirable as a place of residence, and, if known to be such, was rendered almost unsalable.
> Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, V. 9.

milk-sickness (milk'sik″nes), n. A malignant disease, occurring in some parts of the United States, which affects certain kinds of farm stock, and also persons who eat the flesh or dairy products of cattle so infected. The symptoms are vomiting, purging, extreme nervous agitation, etc. From the peculiar tremors that characterize it, it is also called the trembles.

milk-snake (milk'snāk), n. A handsome and harmless serpent, Ophibolus eximius, of the family Colubridæ, common in many parts of the United States. It attains a length of about 3 feet; the coloration is yellowish-gray, with a dorsal series of 50 or more elliptical chocolate black-bordered blotches, and on each side two other alternating series of blotches; the abdomen is yellowish-white with square black blotches. It is also called chicken-snake and thunder-and-lightning snake.

milksop (milk'sop), n. [< ME. milksoppe; < milk, n., + sop, n.] 1. A piece of bread sopped in milk. [Rare.]—2. A soft, effeminate, girlish man; one who is devoid of manliness: a term of contempt.

> Allas! she seith, that ever I was shape
> To wed a milksop or a coward ape.
> Chaucer, Prol. to Monk's Tale, l. 22.
>
> 'Tis now come to that pass that he is no gentleman, a very milk-sop, a clown, of no bringing up, that will not drink. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 143.

milksopism (milk'sop-izm), n. [< milksop + -ism.] The character of a milksop; effeminacy. Noctes Ambrosianæ, Sept., 1832. [Rare.]

milkstone (milk'stōn), n. A white calcined flint, often found in connection with prehistoric remains. They are supposed to have been repeatedly heated in order to be thrown into water to make it boil, at a time when pottery vessels were not made to resist the action of fire.

milk-sugar (milk'shůg″ăr), n. Same as lactose.

milk-tester (milk'tes″tėr), n. A lactometer or ★lactodensimeter. See tester.

milk-thistle (milk'this″l), n. A thistle-like plant, Mariana Mariana, growing as a native in southern Europe, somewhat cultivated and spontaneous elsewhere. The leaves are variegated with white. Sometimes called lady's-thistle.

milk-thrush (milk'thrush), n. In pathol. See aphtha.

milk-tie (milk'tī), n. Same as milk-kinship.

> The strength of the foster-feeling, the milk-tie, among the Scotch Highlanders is a familiar instance of a mode of regarding relationship very different from that prevalent among us. Sir J. Lubbock, Orig. of Civilisation, p. 145.

milk-tooth (milk'tōth), n. [= D. melktand = G. milchzahn = Sw. mjölktand = Dan. melketand.] A tooth of the milk-dentition; a temporary or deciduous tooth, which is shed and replaced. A child has 20 milk-teeth.

milk-tree (milk'trē), n. 1. Same as cow-tree (Piratinera utilis).—2. A tree of one of several other genera, as Tabernæmontana utilis, of British Guiana.—Jamaica milk-tree, or milkwood, Pseudolmedia spuria.—Madagascar milk-tree, Cerbera Odollam. See Cerbera.

milk-tube (milk'tūb), n. In bot., a laticiferous tube.

milk-vat, milk-fat (milk'vat, -fat), n. [< ME. milk-fat*, < AS. meolcfæt (= D. MLG. melkvat = OHG. milichfaz, MHG. milchfaz, G. milchfass = Sw. mjölkfat = Dan. melkefad), a vessel for milk, < meolc, milk, + fæt, vessel: see fat[2], vat.] A tank or tub into which milk is poured, especially for coagulating with rennet, in the manufacture of cheese.

milk-vessel (milk'ves″el), n. In bot., one of the tubes in which a milky fluid is secreted; a laticiferous vessel.

milk-vetch (milk'vech), n. A plant of the genus Astragalus: so called from a belief that these plants increased the secretion of milk in goats feeding upon them.

milk-walk (milk'wâk), n. A round or beat for selling milk; a milkman's route. [Eng.]

> "My father had a milk-walk," he said, and when he died I was without money, and had nothing to do.
> Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, I. 485.

milk-warm (milk'wârm), a. Warm as milk as it comes from the breast or udder.

> They had baths of cool water for the summer; but in general they used it milk-warm.
> Smollett, France and Italy, xxxii. (Davies.)

★milkweed (milk'wēd), n. 1. A general name for plants of the genus Asclepias, somewhat especially for A. Syriaca, the most common American species: so called from their milky juice. The bast of A. Syriaca forms a tough textile fiber. The swamp-milkweed, A. incarnata, is another common species, with rather handsome flesh-colored flowers. Also called silkweed.

2. A plant of the genus Euphorbia, especially E. corollata, the flowering or blooming spurge. See Euphorbia.—3. In Great Britain: (a) The sow-thistle, Sonchus oleraceus. (b) The milk-parsley, Peucedanum palustre.—Green milkweed, a plant of the genus Acerates and perhaps Asclepiodora, both closely allied to Asclepias.

milk-white (milk'hwīt), a. [< ME. milkwhit, melkwhit, < AS. meolchwīt, white as milk, < meolc, milk, + hwīt, white.] White as milk.

> A little western flower,
> Before milk-white, now purple with love's wound,
> And maidens call it love-in-idleness.
> Shak., M. N. D., ii. 1. 167.

milk-woman (milk'wům″an), n. A wet-nurse. [Scotch.]

milkwood (milk'wůd), n. A name of several trees of different genera. (a) The Jamaica milk-tree, Pseudolmedia spuria. (b) A West Indian apocynaceous shrub, Rauvolfia tetraphylla, called hoary-leafed milkwood. (c) A very milky euphorbiaceous tree, a variety of Sapium laurocerasus, called Jamaica milkwood.

milkwort (milk'wėrt), n. 1. A plant of the genus Polygala, formerly imagined to increase the milk of nurses. In Great Britain the common milkwort is P. vulgaris—also called cross-flower, gang-flower, and procession- and rogation-flower, in allusion to its time of blooming and use.

2. A seaside plant, Glaux maritima, with the same supposed property. Also called sea-milkwort.

milky (mil'ki), a. [< milk, n., + -y[1].] 1. Containing, consisting of, or resembling milk: as, a milky fluid; a milky color.

> Some plants, upon breaking their vessels, yield a milky juice. Arbuthnot, Aliments.
> The pails high foaming with a milky flood.
> Pope, Iliad, xvi. 780.
> And milkier every milky sail
> On winding stream or distant sea.
> Tennyson, In Memoriam, cxv.

2. Yielding milk.

> Perhaps my passion he disdains,
> And courts the milky mothers of the plains.
> Roscommon.

3. Full of milt or spawn, as oysters: a trade use.—4. Soft; mild; timorous; effeminate.

> Has friendship such a faint and milky heart,
> It turns in less than two nights?
> Shak., T. of A., iii. 1. 57.
>
> Thy milky meek face makes me sick with hate!
> Shelley, The Cenci, ii. 1.

Milky quartz. Same as milk-quartz.

milky-tailed (mil'ki-tāld), a. Having milky color on the caudal fin: specific in the phrase milky-tailed shiner, the slender silverfin, Notropis galacturus, a cyprinoid fish of mountain streams of the Ohio valley and southward.

Milky Way (mil'ki wā). [Formerly also milken-way; cf. D. melkweg = G. milchweg = Sw. (rare) mjölkväg = Dan. melkevei.] The Galaxy. See Galaxy, 1.

> That Milky Way which down Heav'ns Mountain flows
> Its beauteous smoothness to her footsteps ows.
> J. Beaumont, Psyche, iii. 2.

★mill[1] (mil), n. [< ME. mille, melle, mulle, mylle, earlier miln, milne, myln, mulne, < AS. mylen, myln = OFries. mole = D. molen, meulen = MLG. mole, molle, LG. mölen = OHG. mulīn, mulī, MHG. müle, mül, G. mühle = Icel. mylna = Sw. mölla = Dan. mölle = F. moulin = Sp. molino = Pg. moinho = It. mulino, < LL. molīna, a mill, orig. fem. of L. molīnus, of a mill, < mola, a millstone, pl. molæ, a mill (also grains of spelt ground) (= Gr. μύλη, a millstone, mill), < molere, grind, = Goth. malan = Icel. mala = OHG. malan = AS. malan, grind: see malm, meal[1], mold[1], etc. From the L. mola are also E. mole[3], mole[4], molar, moline, etc., mullet[2], etc.] 1. A mechanical device for grinding grain for food. Ancient mills, and those still in use in uncivilized or half-civilized countries, are simple devices for rubbing or pounding the grain, commonly two stones, one of which is moved upon the other by hand. The common modern mill consists essentially of two flat circular stones, one of which is moved upon the other, and between which the grain is triturated. The bedstone and runner are together called a run of stones. In some mills the under stone is the runner. Such a mill is called an "under-runner," while an "upper-runner" is one like that shown in the cut. The bush, g, in the bedstone is fastened in its place by wedges. The balance-rynd, j, is a curved bar which crosses the eye or central opening of the runner on the under side at the margin of the eye and supports the stone. The supporting bearing of the balance-rynd is a central socket called a cockeye, and the supporting point of the spindle which fits the cockeye is called the cockhead. The spindle, balance-rynd, and runner-stone are raised or lowered by means of the bridge-tree and lighter-screw to adjust the runner properly in relation to the bedstone. The hopper, p, receives the grain to be ground, and delivers it to the shoe, which is loosely supported, and kept constantly vibrating by the rotation of the damsel, a sort of trundle-wheel, the trundles of which chatter against the shoe. Flour is also made by cylinder-mills or roller-mills. The rollers act by crushing, by crushing and rubbing, as when they are caused to run with different peripheral velocities, or by a cutting or scraping action, as when they are serrated and revolved in such manner that the cutting edges of one roller act toward the cutting edges of the other.

Grinding-mill.

a, bedstone; b, runner; c, step or ink; f, bridge-tree; n, eye; o, hoop; p, hopper; q, shoe; r, spout; s, damsel; 2, lighter-screw; 3, husk.

Grinding-mill.

Parts around the spindle and eye: a, bedstone; b, runner; g, bush; h, spindle; i, driver; j, balance-rynd; k, cockeye; l, cockhead; n, eye; p, hopper; q, shoe; s, damsel.

> Thou combrest bothe foo & frende,
> Thi mylle hath grounde thi laste griste.
> Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 74.
>
> Much water goeth by the mill that the miller knoweth not of. J. Heywood, Proverbs (1546), ii. 5.
> Two women shall be grinding at the mill. Mat. xxiv. 41.

2. A machine for grinding or pulverizing any solid substance. The word in this use is generally in composition with a word denoting the purpose for which the mill is designed: as, paint-mill, quartz-mill, coffee-mill.

> One could see by the way he ground the coffee in the mill nailed to the wall that he was reckless of the results.
> W. M. Baker, New Timothy, p. 294.

3. A machine which transforms raw material by a process other than grinding into forms fit for uses to which the raw material is unfitted. In this use also the word is generally in composition, as saw-mill, planing-mill, etc. This use of the word is, however, limited and arbitrary, many machines which transform raw materials not being called mills.

4. A machine which does its work by rotary motion, especially a lapidary wheel.—5. A treadmill. [Colloq.]

A few weeks after I was grabbed for this, and got a month at the mill; but I was quite innocent of prigging.
Quoted in Mayhew's London Labour and London Poor, [I. 390.

6. (a) A building in which grinding is done: often in composition: as, a flour-mill, water-mill, wind*mill*, etc. (b) In metal., any establishment in which metalliferous ores are treated in the moist way, as by stamping and amalgamating, by grinding in pans, or by similar methods. Those works in which the reduction is performed by the aid of fire are usually designated smelting-works, or sometimes (especially in the case of iron) furnaces. In the manufacture of iron a mill is an establishment where the metal in the rougher form (that is, in that of blooms, slabs, rough bars, etc.) is worked up into various kinds of merchantable iron, or into those forms which are desired by the different classes of consumers of the metal, such as rails, plates, merchant bars, and many other similar products. (c) A large building used as a factory, and occupied by machinery for the purposes of manufacture: as, a silk-mill; a cotton-mill.—7. In calico-printing or bank-note engraving, a soft steel roller which receives under great pressure an impressed design in relief from a hardened steel engraved roll or die, and which is used in turn, after being hardened, to impart the design in intaglio to a calico-printing roll or note-printing plate.—8. [Cf. mill[1], v., 1.] A snuff-box. Also mull. [Scotch.]

As soon as I can find my mill, Ye'se get a snuff wi' right guid will.
Picken, Poems, I. 117. (Jamieson.)

He plucked forth a huge horn snuff-box, or mull, as he called it, and proffered me. Scott, Rob Roy, vi.

9. A kind of screw-press introduced during the reign of Elizabeth into England from France, and designed to supersede the manufacture of gold coins by the primitive method of striking dies with a hammer. It was introduced in 1561, discontinued in 1572, reintroduced in 1656 and 1658, and permanently adopted shortly after the restoration of Charles II. The more modern coining-press has supplanted this machine. The mill not only struck the legend, but also raised the rim on the margin and serrated the edge. These serrations were at first straight; but, having been found easy to imitate by filing, they were made curvilinear in the reign of George II.

Coining gold and silver with the mill and press.
Walpole, Anecdotes of Painting, II. iii.

10. In mining, a passage or opening left for sending down stuff from the stopes to the level beneath.—11. [< mill[1], v., 10.] A pugilistic contest; a fight with the fists. [Slang.]

One of the most gratifying mills in the annals of the school. Dickens, Our School.

Barker's mill, an ingenious machine, moved by the centrifugal force of water, invented by Dr. Barker. It consists of a vertical axis CD, moving on a pivot at D, and carrying the upper millstone m, after passing through an opening in the fixed millstone n. Upon this vertical axis is fixed a vertical tube TT, communicating with a horizontal tube AB, at the extremities of which, A and B, are two apertures in opposite directions. When water from the mill-course MN is introduced into the tube TT, it flows out of the apertures A and B, and by the pressure of the water on the parts of the tube opposite the apertures the arm AB, and consequently the whole machine, is put in motion. The bridge-tree ab is elevated or depressed by turning the nut c at the end of the lever cb. The grain to be ground is poured into the hopper H. As modified by Whitelaw it is used in Great Britain under the name of Scotch turbine. See turbine.—Cannon-ball mill. See cannon-ball.—Chilian mill, a form of mill consisting of two heavy wheels or rollers, set parallel on a horizontal shaft, and having a double rotation, that on the horizontal shaft, and a second around a vertical axis controlling the horizontal shaft. The rollers travel in a vat or other suitable receptacle, and scrapers are usually provided to keep the material in the path of the wheels. This form of mill, which is of much antiquity, is now used especially for grinding oleaginous seeds, nuts, fruits, etc. See arrastre.—Cone-and-cradle mill, a mill having a conical muller or grinder reciprocating in a semi-cylindrical concave or bed. E. H. Knight.—Crooke's mill, an occasional name for Crooke's radiometer (which see, under radiometer).—Edge-runner mill, a mill in which the millstones grind by their peripheral surfaces instead of by their flat surfaces. The stones are generally two in number (though a single one is sometimes used), and run in a circular trough provided with a bottom of stone or of iron. The trough holds the material to be ground. The stones are pivoted to the ends of an axle like cart-wheels, and the axle is attached in the middle to a vertical shaft which rolls the stones around in the trough, thus effecting both a rolling and a rubbing action upon the material to be ground. Such mills are used for grinding flaxseed preparatory to expressing the oil, in iron-foundries for grinding sand and clay, and for other purposes.—Horizontal mill, a mill having the acting surfaces in a horizontal plane at right angles to the vertical axis of the revolving stones, as in a grain-grinding mill.—Hydraulic, lapidary, etc., mill. See the adjectives.—Levigating mill. See levigate[1].—Mouse mill, a combined electromagnetic engine and induction electrical machine used for feeding forward the paper record-ribbon, and for electrifying the ink, in Thomson's siphon-recorder for submarine telegraphy.—Revolving mill, a form of Chilian mill in which the pan turns while the axis of the rollers does not change its position; a revolving-pan mill.—To bring grist to the mill. See grist.—To go through the mill. See go.

Barker's Mill.

mill[1] (mil), v. [< mill[1], n.] I. trans. 1. To grind in a mill; grind; reduce to fine particles or to small pieces by grinding or other means. See milling.

'Tis here; this oval box well fill'd
With best tobacco, finely mill'd.
Cowper, To the Rev. William Bull.

Raw crops and milled breadstuffs still sought the cheapest rates of freight.
G. W. Cable, Creoles of Louisiana, p. 249.

2. To subject to the mechanical operations carried on in a mill, as a saw-mill or planing-mill; shape or finish by machinery. Specifically, in ceram., to prepare (the clay) by passing it through a mill, which is usually of the form of an inverted cone, in the center of which is a vertical shaft set with knives. The clay, being thrown in at the top, is kneaded, cut, and pressed by the revolution of the shaft, and when it emerges from the bottom is plastic and ready for molding. See pug-mill.

Lumbermen charge the consumer for the full measurement of the boards [for floors] before they are milled.
Art Age, IV. 46.

3. To cut (metal) with a milling-tool in a milling-machine.—4. To turn or upset the edge of (a coin) so as to produce a marginal ridge or flange on both sides, upon which, when laid flat, the coin rests, thus protecting the design which is inside of the flange from wear, and enabling the coins to lie firmly when piled together one upon another.—5. To flute the edge of, as of a coin, or of any flat piece of metal, as the head of a milled screw or the rim of a metal box-cover, to afford a hold for the fingers. The screws of optical and surgical instruments, and other philosophical apparatus, and also the covers of lubricators for machinery, are commonly milled.

Wood's halfpence are not milled, and therefore more easily counterfeited. Swift, Drapier's Letters, iii.

6. To tumble (leather) in a hollow revolving cylinder in contact with oil or any ameliorating or tanning liquid, whereby the liquid is worked into all parts of the leather.

Twenty-five sides [of leather] being placed in the wheel at one time and . . . gambier liquor poured over them, . . . in this wheel they are milled for about ten minutes.
Davies, Leather, p. 497.

7. To throw, as undyed silk. Encyc. Dict.—8. To thicken by fulling; full (cloth), as in a fulling-mill.—9. To yield, in the process of grinding or milling.—10. To beat severely with the fists; fight. [Slang.]

Having conquer'd the prime one that mill'd us all round,
You kick'd him, old Ben, as he gasp'd on the ground.
Moore, Political and Satirical Poems, Tom Crib to Big Ben.

11. To cause to froth: as, to mill chocolate.—Milled screw. See screw.

II. intrans. 1. To move in a circular direction around a central point or object in a purposeless manner: said of cattle in herding on the plains. [U. S.]

The cattle may begin to run, and then get milling—that is, all crowd together into a mass like a ball, wherein they move round and round, trying to keep their heads towards the center, and refusing to leave it.
T. Roosevelt, The Century, XXXV. 862.

2. To turn suddenly and change its course: said of a whale: as, the whale milled, and ran to leeward. C. M. Scammon, Marine Mammals, p. 311.

mill[2] (mil), n. [< L. mille, pl. milia, millia, a thousand. From the L. mille are also ult. E. mile, million, the first element of millennium, milfoil, etc., and the latter part of billion, trillion, etc.] One thousandth part of anything; especially, in the monetary system of the United States, one thousandth of a dollar, or one tenth of a cent.

mill[3]† (mil), n. [< ME. mil*, mylde (cf. AS. mīl), < OF. mil, meil = Pr. mil, meilh = Sp. millo, mijo = Pg. milho = It. miglio, < L. milium, millet. Cf. millet, in form a dim. of mill[3].] Millet.

They make excellent drinke of Rise, of Mill, and of honie, being well and high coloured like wine.
Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 96.

mill[4]† (mil), v. t. and i. [Perhaps a particular use of mill[1], v.] To steal. [Old slang.]

Can they cant or mill? are they masters in their art?
B. Jonson, Gipsies Metamorphosed.

Millar's asthma. Same as laryngismus stridulus (which see, under laryngismus).

mill-bar (mil'bär), n. Rough bar-iron as drawn out by the puddlers' rolls, as distinguished from merchant bar, which is finished bar-iron ready for sale.

millboard (mil'bōrd), n. A stout kind of pasteboard especially used by binders for the stiff boards upon which the leather or other material for bindings is pasted or glued.—Millboard cutter, a machine having a shaft bearing adjustable knives, used for cutting millboard and cardboard to the sizes required for bookbinding or boxmaking.

mill-cake (mil'kāk), n. 1. In gunpowder-manuf., the cake or mass resulting from the incorporation of the materials. This cake is subjected to a process of granulation.—2. The by-product from linseed, consisting of what is left after the oil has been pressed out.

mill-cinder (mil'sin″dėr), n. In iron-working, the slag of the puddling- or reheating-furnace. After being properly roasted, it consists essentially of the magnetic oxid of iron, and is used as fettling in puddling-furnaces, under the name of bulldog.

mill-dam (mil'dam), n. 1. A dam designed to check the flow of a stream and cause the water to rise until a sufficient head has been obtained to furnish the power necessary for turning a mill-wheel.

The which, once being brust,
Like to a great Mill-damb forth fiercely gusht.
Spenser, F. Q., V. xi. 31.

2. A mill-pond. [Scotch and U. S.]

milldewt, n. An obsolete spelling of mildew.

mill-driver (mil'drī″vėr), n. The combination of devices by which is effected the immediate transmission of power from the motor to the runner-millstone of a mill.

milled (mild), p. a. [Ppr. of mill[1], v.] 1. Made or prepared in or by a grinding-mill.—2. Having undergone the operations of a mill or coining-press: as, milled money. See milled money, below.

Four mill'd crown pieces (or twenty mill'd shillings of the present coin). Locke, Lowering of Interest.

3. Serrated or transversely grooved.

A small condensing lens, and provided with a milled head whereby it can be rotated. Science, XII. 60.

4. Having been formed or treated by machinery; specifically, in printing, made smooth by calendering rollers in a paper-mill.—Double-milled cloth, cloth which has been twice milled to give increased thickness.—Milled cloth, cloth which has been thickened by beating until it is fulled or felted.—Milled lead. See lead[2].—Milled money, coins struck in a mill or coining-press, as distinguished from those produced from a die by striking it with a hammer. See hammered money (under hammer[1]), and compare coining-press. [Milled money was invented by Antoine Brucher in France, and the first was so struck in that country about 1553. Elizabeth of England coined milled money from about 1562 to 1572, when the use of the mill was discontinued, on account of its expense, till about 1656. After 1662 it remained completely established, on account of many advantages which more than compensated for the cost. . . . It seems that they [milled sixpences] were sometimes kept as counters. Nares.]

Millefiori glass. See glass.

millenarian (mil-e-nā'ri-an), a. and n. [Sometimes improp. millennarian; < millenary + -an.] I. a. Relating or pertaining to a thousand, specifically to an expected millennial period of righteousness on earth; chiliastic: as, millenarian speculations.

II. n. One who believes in the millennium; more specifically, one who believes that Christ will visibly reign on earth with his saints for a thousand years or for an indefinite period of time before the end of the world; a chiliast. See millennium.

millenarianism (mil-e-nā'ri-an-izm), n. [Sometimes improp. millennarianism; < millenarian + -ism.] The doctrine of or belief in the coming of the millennium; the doctrine of the reappearance of Christ on earth, the establishment of his kingdom, the resurrection of the saints and of the remaining dead for the general judgment, and an intervening period of a thousand years (or of indefinite length) of perfect righteousness. In the early church the doctrine of millenarianism (chiliasm) was generally held, and many, both of the otherwise orthodox and of heretics, were accused of holding it in a literal or even a gross and sensual sense. Thus, after the fourth century it fell into general disfavor. As A. D. 1000 approached there was a wide-spread panic throughout Europe, under the idea that the prophetic thousand years had expired and that Satan would be let loose. Millenarianism showed itself again in the views of Anabaptists, Fifth Monarchy Men, Millerites, etc. See chiliasm, millennium, premillennialism, postmillennialism.

At various periods in the history of the Middle Ages we encounter sudden outbreaks of millennarianism.
Encyc. Brit., XVI. 317.

millenarism† (mil'e-nā-rizm), n. [< F. millénarisme; as millenar(y) + -ism.] Millenary doctrine or belief; millenarianism.

millenary (mil'e-nā-ri), a. and n. [= F. millénaire = Sp. milenario = Pg. It. millenario, < LL. millenarius, containing a thousand, < milleni, a thousand each, < L. mille, a thousand: see mill[2].] I. a. Consisting of or pertaining to a thousand, specifically a thousand years; in a restricted sense, of or pertaining to the millennium.

We are apt to dream that God will make his saints reign here as kings in a millenary kingdom.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 827.

For I foretell that millenary year.
Dryden, Pal. and Arc., Ded., l. 81.

Millenary petition, a petition presented by about a thousand Puritan ministers to James I. on his progress to London in April, 1603, asking for certain changes in ceremonial, etc.

II. n.; pl. millenaries (-riz). 1. An aggregate of a thousand; specifically, a period of a thousand years; in a restricted sense, the millennium.

Where to fix the beginning of that marvelous millenary, and where to end.
Bp. Hall, Breathings of the Devout Soul, § 15.

2†. A commander or leader of a thousand men.

Likewise the dukes assigne places vnto euery millenarie, or conductor of a thousand souldiers.
Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 60.

3†. One who expects the millennium. See millenarian.

The doctrine of the millenaries . . . in the best ages was esteemed no heresy.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 315.

millennial (mi-len'i-al), a. [< millennium + -al.] Consisting of or relating to a thousand years; pertaining to a millennium, or specifically to the millennium: as, a millennial period; millennial expectations.

To be kings and priests unto God is the characteristic of those that are to enjoy the millennial happiness.
Bp. Burnet.

millennialist (mi-len'i-al-ist), n. [< millennial + -ist.] One who believes in a millennial reign of Christ on earth; a chiliast.

millennianism (mi-len'i-an-izm), n. [< millennian* (< millennium + -an) + -ism.] Millenarianism.

At the outset [of Christianity] a crass millennianism clouded the vision of very many. Prog. Orthodoxy, p. 156.

millenniarism (mi-len'i-a-rizm), n. [< millenniar* (< millennium + -ar[2]) + -ism.] Millenarianism.

millennist† (mil'en-ist), n. [= F. milléniste; as millennium + -ist.] A millenarian.

millennium (mi-len'i-um), n. [= F. millénium = Sp. mileno = Pg. millenio, < NL. millennium, < L. mille, a thousand, + annus, year: see annual.] 1. An aggregate of a thousand years; a period or interval of one thousand years: as, the millennium of the occupation of Iceland celebrated in 1874.

To us nothing seems more unlikely, more inconceivable, than two millenniums of high Egyptian civilization, . . . while all the rest of the world was sunk in darkness.
G. Rawlinson, Origin of Nations, I. 151.

Specifically — 2. In theol., a period during which the kingdom of Christ will be established upon the earth and will predominate over all other authority. The phrase "a thousand years," in Rev. xx. 1–5, has been understood literally, or (on the principle that in Scripture prophecies a day stands for a year, and the Jewish year contained 360 days) as representing 360,000 years. It is generally regarded as indicating an indefinite but long period, and belief in such a period is universal in the Christian church. But whether this predominance of the kingdom of Christ will be accomplished gradually by the gospel, and will precede Christ's second coming, or will follow his second coming and be accomplished by it, is disputed. This question divides theologians into two schools, the postmillenarians, who hold the former view, and the premillenarians, who hold the latter; while many hold that the millennium represents the gospel dispensation or reign of the church, and has accordingly already prevailed for many centuries.

milleped, milliped (mil'e-ped, mil'i-ped), n. [= F. millepieds = Sp. milpiés = Pg. millepedes = It. millepiedi, < L. millepeda, < mille, thousand, + pes (ped-) = E. foot.] 1. A thousand-legs; a myriapod of the suborder Chilognatha or Diplopoda: so called from the very numerous feet, though these are not nearly a thousand in number. The feet are about twice as numerous as those of the similar creatures called centipeds, there being two pairs instead of one pair to most of the segments; the legs are also shorter, and the body is harder and more cylindrical. Millepeds are found in water, and in wet or damp places beneath logs, stones, etc. Unlike some of the centipeds, all are quite harmless animals. Some of the commonest belong to the family Julidæ, as Julus sabulosus. The tufted millepeds are Polyxenidæ; the false millepeds, Polydesmidæ. Pill-millepeds belong to the family Glomeridæ; they are comparatively short and stout, and can roll themselves up into a ball, like the wood-lice of the genus Armadillo. See Chilognatha, and cuts under Myriapoda and thousand-legs.

2. Some small crustacean with many legs, as an isopodous slater; a wood-louse.

Also millepede, millipede.

Millepora (mi-lep'ō-rā), n. [NL.: see millepore.] The typical genus of the family Milleporidæ, so called from the numerous pores upon the surface. These are the openings of as many tubular cells or cavities which traverse the hard coralline substance, and are themselves divided in their deeper parts by close-set transverse partitions or tabular dissepiments, vertical septa being rudimentary or absent.

Millepora alcicornis.

millepore (mil'e-pōr), n. [= F. millépore = Sp. milépora = It. millepora, < NL. Millepora, < L. mille, a thousand, + porus, a passage: see pore.] A coralline hydrozoan of the family Milleporidæ. The millepores were long supposed to be corals, and such is their appearance and the part they play in the formation of reefs. They belong, however, to a different class of animals, the Hydrozoa (not Actinozoa), being among the few members of their class which form a hard calcareous polypary or polypidom like the stone-corals, and the leading representatives of the order called Hydrocorallinæ (which see). The incrusting substance forms a dense deposit upon the outer surface of the ramified hydrosome. There are two kinds of zoöids or polypites: short broad alimentary zoöids (gastrozoöids) with 4 or 6 tentacles, surrounded each by a zone of from 5 to 20 or more long mouthless zoöids (dactylozoöids) with numerous tentacles, having no ampullæ. The zoöids are dilated at their bases, and there give off tubular processes which ramify and inosculate, giving rise to a thin hydrosome.

Milleporidæ (mil-e-por'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Millepora + -idæ.] A family of hydrocoralline hydrozoans, typified by the genus Millepora. See millepore and Hydrocorallinæ.

milleporiform (mil-e-por'i-fôrm), a. [< NL. Millepora + L. forma, form.] Having the form or appearance of a millepore; milleporine.

Milleporina (mi-lep-ō-rī'nā), n. pl. [NL., < Millepora + -ina[2].] Same as Milleporidæ.

milleporine (mil'e-pō-rin), a. Pertaining to the Milleporidæ, or having their characters; resembling a millepore; milleporiform.

milleporite (mil'e-pōr-īt), n. [< millepore + -ite[2].] A fossil millepore.

miller (mil'ėr), n. [< ME. miller, mellēr, millere, mellere, earlier mylner, mylnere, milnere (a form remaining in the surname Milner), < AS. mylnere* (not recorded; another term was mylnweard, 'mill-ward') = OS. muleniri = Fries. meller = D. mulder, molenaar = MLG. molner, molre, moller = OHG. mulinari, MHG. mülnære, mülner, G. müller (as a surname also Müllner) = Icel. mylnari = Sw. mjölnare = Dan. möller, < LL. molinarius, a miller, < molīna, a mill: see mill[1], n.] 1. One who grinds grain in a mill; one who keeps or who attends to a mill, especially a grain-mill.

More water glideth by the mill
Than wots the miller of.
Shak., Tit. And., ii. 1. 87.

2. A milling-machine. — 3. A moth whose wings appear as if dusted over with flour or meal, like a miller's clothes; hence, almost any small moth, such as fly about lights at night. Common millers in the United States are Ctenucha virginica, a moth whose larva is one of the woolly-bear caterpillars, and Hyphantria cunea, the web-worm moth. The little yellowish moths of the genera Crambus and Botis are also commonly called millers. See cuts under Crambidæ and Hyphantria. 4. A fish, the eagle-ray, Myliobatis aquila; a mill-skate. — 5. The hen-harrier, Circus cyaneus. [Prov. Eng.] — 6. A young flycatcher. C. Swainson, Brit. Birds, 1885, p. 49. [Local, Eng.] — Cross miller. See cross[1], n.

millering† (mil'ėr-ing), n. [< miller + -ing[1].] The dust of a flour-mill.

And she would meal you with millering
That she gathers at the mill.
Earl Richard (Child's Ballads, III. 273).

Millerism (mil'ėr-izm), n. [< Miller (see Millerite[1]) + -ism.] The doctrines of the Millerites.

Millerite[1] (mil'ėr-īt), n. [< Miller (see def.) + -ite[2].] A disciple of the American William Miller, who from 1833 till his death in 1849 publicly interpreted the Scriptures as fixing the second advent of Christ and the beginning of the millennium in the immediate future (at first about 1843). His followers form a still existing denomination of Adventists.

millerite[2] (mil'ėr-īt), n. [Named after W. H. Miller (died 1880), an English crystallographer.] Native nickel sulphid, a mineral having a bronze color and metallic luster, often occurring in tufts of capillary crystals, and hence called hair-pyrites, capillary pyrites. It is found also in incrustations with fibrous or radiated structure; in the latter form it is a valuable nickel ore.

miller's-coat† (mil'ėrz-kōt), n. A coat of fence in use in the sixteenth century, apparently a buff-coat or similar defense of leather.

miller's-dog (mil'ėrz-dog), n. A kind of shark or dogfish, Galeus galeus.

miller's-thumb (mil'ėrz-thum), n. 1. A fish, Cottus gobio, of the family Cottidæ. The name is due to the fancied resemblance of the head to the form a miller's thumb is popularly supposed to assume from the frequent sampling of meal with the hand.

Miller's-thumb (Cottus gobio).

2. Any fresh-water sculpin of the genus Cottus or Uranidea; one of the little star-gazers, of which there are several species, as U. gracilis. [U. S.] — 3. The bib (a fish), Gadus luscus. [Great Britain.] — 4. The golden-crested wren, Regulus cristatus · the thumb-bird. [Eng.] — 5. The willow-warbler, Phylloscopus trochilus.

millesimal (mi-les'i-mal), a. [= F. millesimo = Sp. milésimo = Pg. It. millesimo, < L. millesimus, the thousandth, < mille, a thousand: see mill[2].] Thousandth · consisting of thousandth parts: as, millesimal fractions.

millet (mil'et), n. [< F. millet, millet, dim. of mil, millet: see mill[3].] 1. A cereal grass, Panicum miliaceum, known from antiquity, and still cultivated in the East and in southern and central Europe. It is an annual, from 2 to 4 feet high, with profuse foliage, the flowers abundant, in open nodding panicles. The grain is one of the best for fowls, and affords a nutritious and palatable table-food. As cultivated in the United States, it is mostly used for fodder, and elsewhere it is less sowed than formerly.

2. One of several other grasses: generally with a prefixed descriptive. See below. — Arabian or evergreen millet, a variety of Indian millet. [Local, U. S.] — Cat-tail, East Indian, Egyptian, pearl millet, in the southern United States, a tall grass, Penicillaria spicata, there cultivated as a forage-plant. In India it serves as a cereal. — Hungarian millet. See Italian millet. — Indian millet, African millet, a stout cereal grass commonly known as Sorghum vulgare, but now regarded as part of a multiform species, Andropogon Sorghum, which includes among its varieties the common broom-corn and sorghum. It is extensively cultivated in the Mediterranean region and the Orient, occupying the place of a staple grain. The seed properly treated makes a bread of good quality, and is a good grain for quadrupeds and fowls. The plant serves also for green fodder. This is the durra or doura of Africa and India. It has been introduced to some extent into the United States, where it is sometimes called coffee- or chocolate-corn, because of its attempted use as a substitute for coffee. Also called guinea-corn, Kafir-corn. — Italian millet, Chætochloa Italica, originally an Asiatic grass: its variety Germanica is known as Hungarian millet and Bengal or Hungarian grass. (See grass.) Its seeds are suited to cage-birds and fowls, and it is to some extent used as a food-grain; in America it is raised mostly for forage. — Millet coda or khoda, the grain of Paspalum scrobiculatum, an East Indian cereal.

millet-grass (mil'et-gràs), n. See Milium.

mill-eye (mil'ī), n. The eye or opening in the cases of a mill at which the meal is let out.

A noble and seemly baron's mill, . . . that casts the meal through the mill-eye by forpits at a time.
Scott, Pirate, xi.

mill-feeder (mil'fē″dėr), n. A projection on a mill-spindle which agitates a spout beneath the hopper, thus shaking the grain into the eye of the runner.

mill-file (mil'fīl), n. A thin flat file used in machine-shops for lathe-work and draw-filing. E. H. Knight.

mill-furnace (mil'fėr″nās), n. In iron-works, a furnace in which the puddled bar, or the higher grades of malleable iron, are reheated in order to be rerolled or welded under the hammer or mill-rolls.

mill-gang (mil′gang), n. In warping, that part of the warp which is made by a descending and ascending course of the threads round the warping-mill E. H. Knight.

mill-hand (mil′hand), n. A person employed in a mill.

mill-head (mil′hed), n. The head of water by which a mill-wheel is turned.

mill-holm (mil′hōm), n. A low meadow or field in the vicinity of a mill, or a marshy place about a mill-dam.

mill-hopper (mil′hop″ėr), n. In a grinding-mill, a hopper from which grain is supplied to the stones.—Mill-hopper alarm an automatic device for giving notice to the miller, usually by a bell, when the grist in the hopper is nearly exhausted.

mill-horse (mil′hôrs), n. A horse (often blind) used to turn a mill.

'Tis a dull thing to travel, like a mill-horse,
Still in the place he was born in, lam'd and blinded.
Fletcher (and another), Queen of Corinth, ii. 4.

milli-. [< L. mille, millia, milia, a thousand: see million[1].] An element meaning 'thousand,' also used for 'a thousandth part,' especially in words relating to physics: as, millimeter (the thousandth part of a meter).

milliampere (mil′i-am-pār″), n. [< L. mille, a thousand (see milli-), + E. ampere.] An electrical unit equal to the thousandth part of an ampere.

milliard (mil′iärd), n. [< F. milliard, < mille (< L. mille, thousand) + -ard.] A thousand millions: as, a milliard of francs. This word became familiar in English through the payment by France to Germany, after the close of the war of 1870–1, of an indemnity of five milliards of francs (about $1,000,000,000).

milliare[1] (mil-i-ā′rē), n. [L., < mille, a thousand: see milli-.] An ancient unit of length, 8 stadia; a mile.

milliare[2] (mil′i-ār), n. [< F. milliare, < L. mille, a thousand (see milli-), + F. are, an are: see are[2].] A unit of surface in the metric system, the one thousandth part of an are, equivalent to 155.00 square inches.

milliary (mil′i-ā-ri), a. and n. [= F. milliaire, < L. miliarius, milliarius, containing a thousand, neut. milliarium, miliarium, the number one thousand, a milestone, < mille, pl. milia, a thousand: see mill[2], mile.] I. a. Pertaining to the ancient Roman mile of a thousand paces or five thousand Roman feet; marking a mile.

Before this was once placed a miliary column, supposed to be set in the center of the citty.
Evelyn, Diary, Nov. 4, 1644.

II. n. A milestone; specifically, a stone or column set up to form a point of departure in measuring distances.

When we approached Sidon, I saw, about a mile from the town, an antient Roman milliary in the road; . . . it is a round pillar of grey granite.
Pococke, Description of the East, II. 85.

millier (mēl-yā′), n. [F., < L. mille, a thousand: see milli-.] In the metric system, a weight equal to a thousand kilograms, or 2,204.6 pounds avoirdupois (nearly a ton). It is the weight of one cubic meter of water at 4° C.

millifold† (mil′i-fōld), a. [< L. mille, a thousand, + E. -fold.] Thousandfold.

His kisses millifold
Bewray his loue and louing diligence.
Davies, Holy Roode, p. 27. (Davies.)

milligram, milligramme (mil′i-gram), n. [= It. milligramma, < F. milligramme, < mille, a thousand (see milli-), + gramme, a gram: see gram[2].] The thousandth part of a gram, equal to 0.015432, or about $\frac{1}{65}$, of a grain.

milliliter, millilitre (mil′i-lē-tėr), n. [= It. millilitro, < F. millilitre, < mille, a thousand (see milli-), + litre, a liter: see liter[2].] A thousandth part of a liter, hence equal to 1 cubic ★centimeter or 0.06102 cubic inch.

millimeter, millimetre (mil′i-mē-tėr), n. [= It. millimetro, < F. millimètre, < mille, a thousand (see milli-), + F. mètre, meter: see meter[3].] The thousandth part of a meter, equal to 0.03937 inch, or nearly $\frac{2}{5}$ inch. It is denoted by mm.: as, 25.4 mm. equals 1 inch.

milliner (mil′i-nėr), n. [Formerly also millaner, millener, millenier; prob. orig. Milaner, a trader from or with Milan (formerly spelled Millaine, Milleyne, etc.) in Italy, famous for its silks and ribbons, as well as for its cutlery; < Milan + -er[1]. Cf. Milanese. The term mantua-maker, usually cited in this connection, has no relevancy, not being connected with Mantua in Italy. The word milliner was formerly explained as designating "one having a thousand small wares to sell" (Minsheu), as if < L. millenarius, containing a thousand, < mille, a thousand: see millenary.] 1. Formerly, a man who dealt in articles for women's wear; according to Johnson, "one who sells ribands and dresses for women"; now, in common usage, a woman who makes and sells bonnets and other head-gear for women; also, in England, one who furnishes both bonnets and dresses, or complete outfits.

No Milliner can so fit his customers with Gloues.
Shak., W. T. (folio 1623), iv. 4. 192.

To conceal such real ornaments as these, and shadow their glory, as a milliner's wife does her wrought stomacher with a smoaky lawn or a black cyprus!
B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour (ed. Whalley, 1756), i. 3.

2†. Formerly, one who made or sold armor of Milan; hence, a dealer in armor.

After the year 1500 there were great shops, where armour was sold by the milliners, or armourers of Milan, and by others; and whole suits of armour are frequently found exactly like each other, as they were made for sale to the first comer, and not for any person in particular.
R. Curzon, Archæol. Inst. Jour., XXII. 6.

Milliner's fold, a strip of velvet, silk, or the like, folded near both edges, and then again so as to bring one of the two original folds above the other.—Milliner's needle, a long slender needle used in trimming bonnets, etc.

millinery (mil′i-nėr-i), n. [< milliner + -y[3].] 1. The articles made or sold by a milliner.—2. The industry of making bonnets and other head-dresses for women. This work was formerly in the hands of men, but is now almost exclusively a women's occupation.

Those who are cunning in the arts of millinery and dressmaking. Dickens, Nicholas Nickleby, xvii.

millinet (mil′i-net), n. [Irreg. < millin(er) + -et.] 1. A sort of coarse, stiff, thin muslin.—★2. A machine-made net. E. H. Knight.

milling (mil′ing), n. [Verbal n. of mill[1], v.] 1. The process of grinding, or subjecting materials to the action of the machinery of a grinding-mill. Specifically—2. The manufacture of cereals into flour or meal. The manufacture of fine flour is now carried on by two distinct methods, respectively called low milling and high milling. Low milling prevailed almost universally until a recent period; but it is now largely superseded by high milling, by which an increased product and a much purer quality of flour are obtainable, especially from wheat inferior to the higher grades. In low milling the grain is ground only once and then bolted. In high milling it is subjected to repeated grindings. The earlier grinding or grindings decorticate the grain, which, being subjected after each grinding to screening and blowing in the middlings purifier, is freed from adherent impurities, and from parts which envelop the finer nutritious portions. The latter thus cleansed are called semolina (half-ground). The semolina is then subjected to grinding, cylinder-milling, or disintegration milling, to complete its conversion into fine flour. Cylinder-milling, also called roller-milling, is the manufacture of flour by the use of cylinder-mills. Disintegration milling is the manufacture of flour or meal by the use of the disintegrator. See mill[1].
3. The operation of upsetting the edge of a coin-blank to form the milled edge; also, the operation of putting the series of small transverse ridges and furrows on the edge of an otherwise finished coin, or on a screw-head to adapt it for easy turning with the fingers. See milled screw, under screw.—4. A method of shaping metals in a milling-machine, by passing the metal under a serrated revolving cylinder or cutter.—5. In metal-working, a method of ornamenting metallic surfaces by treatment in a lathe with ribbed tools, which produce ridged surfaces.—6. A method of softening and opening the pores of hides by placing them with some tan-liquor in a wooden drum which is caused to revolve.—7. The felting or fulling of a cloth to thicken it.

The term milling embraces all those operations which are calculated to effect the felting of the woolen fibres in the fabric by means of pressure or friction.
Benedikt, Coal-tar Colours (trans.), p. 54.

8. In pottery, the operation of grinding and mixing the slip.—9. A thrashing; a fight; a beating. [Slang.]

One blood gives t'other blood a milling.
W. Combe, Dr. Syntax, ii. 2.

I determined to box it out with destiny, and put myself in a Cribb-like attitude for a milling-match with my fortunes. Mrs. Gore, Cecil, p. 158.

10. The act of playing around in a circle: said of a school of fish. Also called cart-wheeling.—High milling, in flour-manuf., a method of milling in which the wheat is subjected to a succession of slight partial crushing operations, the product being sifted and sorted after each operation.—Low milling, the older process of close grinding with the stones as near together as ★possible, as opposed to the more modern high milling.

milling-cutter (mil′ing-kut″ėr), n. Same as ★milling-machine.

milling-machine (mil′ing-ma-shēn″), n. 1. A power machine-tool for shaping metal and cutting the teeth of gears by means of a rotating serrated spindle or cylindrical cutter. It has a movable table, to which the work is fixed and on which it is brought to the cutter; and it is fitted with index-plates and other appliances for securing accuracy in the work.

The position occupied by the milling-machine in modern practical mechanics is almost as important as that occupied by the lathe or planing-machine.
Joshua Rose, Practical Machinist, p. 338.

2. A machine for impressing on coins a milled edge or legend corresponding to the milling.

Millingtonia (mil-ing-tō′ni-ạ), n. [NL. (Carl Linné, filius, 1781), named after Thomas Millington, a professor at Oxford.] A genus of bignoniaceous trees, with corky bark, opposite, 2- to 3-pinnate leaves, and handsome white flowers, the corolla-tube often 2 to 3 inches long, disposed in corymbs at the ends of the branches. There is but one species, M. hortensis, the East Indian cork-tree, the exact original habitat of which is not known, but which has been cultivated in India from the earliest records. See cork-tree.

milling-tool (mil′ing-tōl), n. A small indented roller used to mill or nurl the edges of the heads of screws; a nurling-tool.

million[1] (mil′yon), n. and a. [< ME. millioun, milion = D. millioen, miljoen = G. Sw. Dan. million, < OF. (and F.) million = Pr. milio = Sp. millon = Pg. milhão = It. milione, millione (> ML. millio(n-)), a million, aug. of mille, < L. mille, a thousand: see milli-.] I. n. 1. The number of ten hundred thousand, or a thousand thousand.

Coueyte not his goodes
For milions of moneye; morther hem vchone.
Piers Plowman (A), iii. 255.

O, pardon! since a crooked figure may Attest in little place a million.
Shak., Hen. V., Prol., l. 16.

2. The amount of a thousand thousand units of money, as pounds, dollars, or francs: as, he is worth a million; millions have been wasted in preparation for war.—3. A very great number or quantity, indefinitely.

For we are at the stake,
And bay'd about with many enemies;
And some that smile have in their hearts, I fear, Millions of mischief. Shak., J. C., iv. 1. 51.

There are millions of truths that men are not concerned to know. Locke.

The million, the great body of the people; the multitude; the public; the masses.

For the play, I remember, pleased not the million; 'twas caviare to the general. Shak., Hamlet, ii. 2. 457.

Three-million bill, in U. S. hist., a bill passed in 1847 appropriating three million dollars for the purchase of land from Mexico. It was introduced in the House of Representatives with the Wilmot Proviso (see proviso) as a rider, and passed by the Senate after rejection of the rider.

II. a. [Strictly a collective noun: see hundred.] A thousand times one thousand; ten hundred thousand: as, a capital of a (or one) million dollars; a country of ten million inhabitants.

million[2] (mil′yon), n. An obsolete or dialectal form of melon[1].

millionaire, millionnaire (mil-yon-ār′), n. [= D. G. millionair = Sw. millionär = Dan. millionær; < F. millionnaire (= Sp. millionario, millonario = Pg. It. millionario), one who owns a million, < million, a million: see million[1].] A man worth a million dollars, pounds, francs, etc.; an owner of a million or of millions.

The plain unsceptered king, the man of gold,
The thrice illustrious threefold millionaire
Mark his slow-creeping, dead, metallic stare.
O. W. Holmes, The Banker's Dinner.

★millionary (mil′yon-ā-ri), a. [= F. millionnaire; as million[1] + -ary.] Pertaining to or consisting of millions: as, the millionary chronology of the Pundits. Imp. Dict.

millioned (mil′yond), a. [< million[1] + -ed[2].] 1. Multiplied by millions. [Rare.]

Time, whose million'd accidents
Creep in 'twixt vows and change decrees of kings.
Shak., Sonnets, cxv.

2. Having millions.

The million'd merchant seeks her in his gold.
P. Whitehead, Honour, a Satire.

millionism (mil′yon-izm), n. [< million[1] + -ism.] The state or condition of having millions.

Billionism or even millionism must be a blessed kind of state. O. W. Holmes, Elsie Venner, vii.

millionist (mil′yon-ist), n. [< million[1] + -ist.] A millionaire.

A commercial millionist. Southey, Doctor, ccxxxiii.

millionize (mil′yon-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. millionized, ppr. millionizing. [< million[1] + -ize.] To accustom to millions. Davies.

To our now millionized conceptions the foregoing accompts appear to be in a very moderate ratio.
Archæologia, XXXIII. 201.

millionnaire, n. See millionaire.

millionth (mil′yonth), a. and n. [< million[1] + -th[3].] I. a. Ten hundred thousandth; being one of a million.

II. n. One of a million parts; the quotient of unity divided by a million; a ten hundred thousandth part.

milliped, n. See milleped.

millipede (mil′i-pēd), n. Same as milleped.

millistere (mil′i-stār), n. [< F. millistère, < L. mille, a thousand (see milli-), + F. stère, a stere.] In the metric system, a unit of dry measure, the one thousandth part of a stere, equivalent to 1 cubic decimeter or 61.024 cubic inches. It is not in practical use.

millivolt (mil′i-vōlt), n. [< L. mille, a thousand, + E. volt.] The thousandth part of a volt.

mill-jade (mil′jād), n. A mill-horse.

> Would you have me stalk like a mill-jade,
> All day, for one that will not yield us grains?
> B. Jonson, Alchemist, iii. 2.

millman (mil′man), n.; pl. millmen (-men). One who is employed in a mill.

> The millmen are also unable to work with their usual vigour. The Engineer, LXV. 535.

mill-money (mil′mun″i), n. Milled or coined money.

> What should you,
> Or any old man, do, wearing away
> In this world with diseases, and desire
> Only to live to make their children scourge-sticks,
> And hoard up mill-money? Beau. and Fl., Captain, i. 3.

mill-mountain† (mil′moun″tān), n. A European flax, Linum catharticum.

millocrat (mil′ō-krat), n. [< mill[1] + -o-crat as in aristocrat, etc.] A wealthy mill-owner; a manufacturer who has a wide influence from his wealth or the number of people in his employment. [Rare.]

> The true blood-suckers, the venomous millocrats.
> Bulwer, Caxtons, ii. 4. (Davies.)

millocratism (mil′ō-krat-izm), n. [< millocrat + -ism.] The rule of millocrats. Bulwer.

millon†, n. An obsolete form of melon[1].

mill-pick (mil′pik), n. A tool for dressing millstones—that is, giving them a corrugated or otherwise roughened surface. Also called millstone-hammer, millstone-pick.

mill-pond (mil′pond), n. A pond or reservoir of water for use in driving a mill-wheel.

mill-pool (mil′pōl), n. [< ME. millepol,* < AS. mylenpōl, mylenpūl, < mylen, mill, + pōl, pool.] A mill-pond.

mill-post (mil′pōst), n. A stout post bearing some essential relation to a mill, as a post forming the vertical shaft of a windmill, and especially, in some forms of windmill, as the post-mill, the post upon which the entire mill is supported, or a post upon which the cap of a smock-mill, bearing the sails, turns.

> They [the trees of New England] are not very thick, yet many of them are sufficient to make Mill posts; some being three foot and a half in the Diameter.
> S. Clarke, Four Plantations in America (1670), p. 30.

> Out of doors reigned Molly Mills, . . . with her short red petticoat, legs like millposts.
> Lady Holland, Sydney Smith, vii.

mill-race (mil′rās), n. The current of water that drives a mill-wheel, or the channel in which it flows from the dam to the mill.

millrea†, millree† (mil′rē), n. Obsolete forms of milreis.

mill-ream (mil′rēm), n. A package of hand-made paper containing 480 sheets, of which the two outer quires (48 sheets) are imperfect. A ream of 480 sheets of perfect paper is known as a ream of insides. [Eng.]

mill-rine, n. In her. See fer de mouline.

mill-rolls (mil′rōlz), n. pl. The rolls employed in bringing puddled bar-iron into suitable shape for the market.

millround (mil′round), n. A monotonous round of labor like that on a treadmill.

> How sick he must have been of the eternal millround —seed-time and harvest.
> R. Broughton, Cometh up as a Flower, v.

mill-rynd (mil′rīnd), n. The rynd of a millstone. See rynd, and mill[1], 1.

mill-sail (mil′sāl), n. A sail of a windmill. In windmills there are usually four of these sails, of canvas, extended on the sail-frames or "whips," and sometimes provided with reefing devices by which the surfaces exposed to the action of wind can be varied in extent to adapt them to variations in the force of the wind. See windmill and wind-wheel.

mill-scale (mil′skāl), n. An incrustation of a black oxid of iron formed on iron in the process of being rolled, just as forge-scale is on that which is being forged. In the one case it peels off in the rolling; in the other it is thrown off by the blows of the hammer.

mill-sixpence (mil′siks″pens), n. An English silver coin, of the value of sixpence, produced by the mill-and-screw process. See milled money, under milled.

> Fal. Pistol, did you pick Master Slender's purse?
> Slen. Ay, by these gloves, did he, . . . of seven groats in mill-sixpences. Shak., M. W. of W., i. 1. 158.

mill-skate (mil′skāt), n. The eagle-ray, Myliobatis aquila.

mill-spindle (mil′spin″dl), n. The vertical shaft or spindle of a grinding-mill, by which the runner or revolving millstone is supported. See mill[1], 1.

Mill-spindle.

a, spindle; b, bush; c, rynd; d, step, ink, or trampot; e, bridge-tree; f, lighter-screw; g, hand-wheel which operates the lighter-screw.

mill-stank† (mil′stangk), n. A mill-pond or -dam.

> And that the authority given by the Commissioner of Sewers did not extend to Mills, Mill-stanks, Causeys, etc., erected before the Reign of King E. 1.
> Case of Chester [Mill, 10 Coke, 138, b.

millstone (mil′stōn), n. [Early mod. E. also milstone; < ME. mylston, mylle-stone, mullston, melstan, mylnston, < AS. mylenstān (= D. molensteen = MLG. molenstēn = MHG. mülstein, G. mühlstein = Dan. möllesten), a millstone, < mylen, mill, + stān, stone: see mill[1] and stone.] One of a pair of cylindrical stones used in a mill for grinding grain. The kind of stone best adapted for this use is known as burstone, and is both domestic and imported. The two stones are placed one over the other; and in the operation of grinding one of them remains at rest and is called the bed, while the other, usually the upper stone, revolves and is called the runner. (See mill[1], 1.) The face of a millstone is cut with lines or channels called furrows, which lead from the center to the circumference and have flat spaces between them called land. The furrows and land are together called the dress; they are arranged in various ways. A sunken space about the eye of the stone is called the bosom.

Modes of Dressing Millstones.

a. Radial and circular dress. b. Quarter dress. c. Dress for iron grinding-plate. d. Curved and circular dress.

> As don thise rokkes or thise mylne stones.
> Chaucer, Troilus, ii. 1384.

Bolting-millstone. See bolting[2].—Fairy millstone. See fairy.—Lava millstone. See lava.—Millstone-dress, the arrangement of the furrows on the face of a millstone.—To see into or through a millstone, to see with acuteness, or to penetrate into abstruse subjects.

> Your eyes are so sharpe that you can not onely looke through a milstone, but cleane through the mind.
> Lyly, Euphues and his England, p. 287.

To weep or drop millstones†, to be insensible to emotion; remain hard and stony under or in view of the deepest affliction.

> Your eyes drop millstones, when fools' eyes drop tears.
> Shak., Rich. III., i. 3. 354.

millstone-balance (mil′stōn-bal″ans), n. A weight so placed as to balance any inequalities of weight in a millstone.

millstone-bridge (mil′stōn-brij), n. The bar crossing the eye of a millstone and supporting it on the head of the spindle; a balance-rynd. E. H. Knight.

millstone-curb (mil′stōn-kėrb), n. The covering of the stones used in grinding; a husk or hurst. E. H. Knight.

millstone-dresser (mil′stōn-dres″ėr), n. 1. A workman whose business is to dress millstones. —2. A machine for forming millstones, especially for cutting the furrows on the face of a millstone. Such machines range from hand-appliances having pivoted hammers for picking and chipping the stone to large power-machines employing rotary disks and mandrels armed with diamonds or borts, and include a great variety of machines which cause cutters to travel in radial lines over the face of the stones, as well as lathes in which the stone is made to revolve before traversing tool-rests carrying cutting-mandrels in rapid revolution. Smaller machines are portable, and are guided by hand over the stone while the cutting-tool is revolved at a high speed by means of a belt.

millstone-driver (mil′stōn-drī″vėr), n. The device on a millstone-spindle which drives the runner by impinging against its bail.

millstone-feed (mil′stōn-fēd), n. A device by which the quantity of grain fed to a millstone is regulated, as by means of an adjustable gate in the aperture of the hopper.

millstone-grit (mil′stōn-grit), n. A silicious conglomerate rock, so called because it has been worked for millstones in England. It constitutes one of the members of the Carboniferous group, underlying the true coal-measures, and overlying the mountain limestone. In Wales and southwestern England it is known as "farewell rock," because when the miners strike it they bid farewell to profitable seams. The millstone-grit is an important and persistent member of the Carboniferous series both in Europe and in the United States. In parts of England it attains a thickness of over 5,000 feet. Where the series to which this name is given is developed to this extent, however, it contains intercalated beds of shale and clay and even of coal. In Pennsylvania the millstone-grit is sometimes called the Great or Pottsville Conglomerate. At Pottsville, on the eastern edge of the anthracite fields, it is over a thousand feet thick, but it thins very much in going west.

> The Fourth Sand-Rock is the well-known No. XII., or the Great Conglomerate. It has its representation in the millstone grit beneath the European coal. It is the floor of the true coal measures, an immense preparatory outspread of sand and pebble-stones of every variety, but chiefly pure white quartz, and of every size, from the minute mustard seed and pepper corn to the hen's egg and in the Susquehanna region even the ostrich egg.
> J. P. Lesley, Coal and its Topography, p. 70.

millstone-hammer (mil′stōn-ham″ėr), n. Same as mill-pick.

millstone-pick (mil′stōn-pik), n. Same as mill-pick.

millstone-ventilator (mil′stōn-ven″ti-lā-tor), n. A blower and connecting pipes for forcing a blast through the eye of a runner-stone for the purpose of cooling the stones and meal.

mill-tail (mil′tāl), n. The current of water leaving a mill-wheel after turning it, or the channel through which it runs; a tail-race.

> The Mill-tail, or Floor for the water below the wheels, is wharfed up on either side with stone.
> Defoe, Tour through Great Britain, I. 336. (Davies.) mill-tooth† (mil′tōth), n. A grinder; a molar.

mill-ward (mil′wârd), n. [< ME. milward, meleward, < AS. mylenweard, a miller, < mylen, mill, + weard, keeper.] The keeper of a mill.

millweir (mil′wēr), n. [< ME. millewere* (?), < AS. mylenwer, mylewer* (= G. mühlwehr), a millweir, < mylen, mill, + wer, a weir: see weir.] See weir.

mill-wheel (mil′hwēl), n. [< ME. millewhele* (?), < AS. mylenhweól, mylenhweowul, a mill-wheel, < mylen, mill, + hweól, hweogul, wheel.] A wheel used to drive a mill; a water-wheel.

mill-work (mil′wėrk), n. 1. Machinery used in mills or manufactories.—2. The designing, construction, arrangement, and erection of machinery in mills or manufactories.

millwright (mil′rīt), n. An engineer who designs, constructs, and erects mills, their motors, machinery, and appurtenances, particularly flouring- and grist-mills.—Millwrights' compass. See compass.

millwrighting (mil′rī″ting), n. The work or business of a millwright.

> Engineering and millwrighting, though synonymous, are often two distinct branches in a shop.
> Engineer, LXVII. 63.

milne†, n. An obsolete form of mill[1].

milord (mi-lôrd′), n. [F. milord, formerly also milort (Cotgrave), = Sp. milord (pl. milores), < E. my lord.] A continental rendering of the English my lord.

milray†, n. See milreis.

milreis (mil′rēs), n. [Formerly milrea, milray, milleray (F. milleret—Cotgrave); < Pg. milreis, < mil (< L. mille), a thousand, + reis, pl. of real = Sp. real, a small coin: see *real*³, n.] 1. A Portuguese unit of money, equivalent to 1,000 reis, and worth $1.08.—2. A Brazilian unit of money, equal to 54.6 United States cents.

Obverse. Reverse.

Milreis of Portugal. (Size of the original.)

milset†, v. t. [ME. milsen, milcen, milcien, < AS. mildsian, miltsian, gemiltsian, be merciful, < milds, milts, kindness, mercy, < milde, mild: see mild, a.] To be merciful to; show clemency to.

milsey (mil'si), n. [Contr. of milk-sieve.] A sieve for straining milk. [Local, Great Britain.]

milt¹† (milt), n. [< ME. milte, < AS. milte = OFries. milte = D. milt = MLG. LG. milte = OHG. milzi, MHG. milze, G. milz (> It. milza = Sp. melsa) = Icel. milti = Sw. mjelte = Dan. milt, the spleen; prob. from the root of melt.] In anat., the spleen.

Yet do they offer Swine to the Moon & Bacchus . . . when the Moon is at full. In this sacrifice they burne the taile, milt, and leafe. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 577.

milt² (milt), n. [A corruption of milk, in this sense appar. of Scand. origin: < Sw. mjölke, milt (< mjölk, milk), = Dan. melke, milt, = G. milch = MLG. melk, milk, also milt: see milk, n. The D. milt, milt, is appar. < E.] The male generative organ of a fish; the spermatic organ and its secretion; the soft roe, corresponding to the roe or spawn of the female. Sometimes melt.

You shall scarce or never take a male carp without a melt, or a female without a roe or spawn.
I. Walton, Complete Angler (ed. 1653), p. 162.

milt² (milt), v. t. [< *milt*², n.] To impregnate the roe or spawn of (the female fish).

milter (mil'tėr), n. [= D. milter (prob. < E. ?) = G. milcher; as *milt*² + *-er*¹.] That which has or sheds milt; a male fish in breeding-time. Also melter.

For the purpose of breeding he had, as the rule is, put in [a pond] three melters for one spawner.
I. Walton, Complete Angler (ed. 1875), p. 143.

Miltonian (mil-tō'ni-an), a. [< Milton (see def.) + -ian.] Of or relating to the great English poet John Milton (1608–74), or resembling his style.

Merely a Miltonian way of saying . . . that moral no less than physical courage demanded a sound body.
Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 267.

Miltonic (mil-ton'ik), a. [< Milton (see Miltonian) + -ic.] Relating or pertaining to Milton or his works; Miltonian.

If Time, the Avenger, execrates his wrongs,
And makes the word Miltonic mean "sublime."
Byron, Don Juan, Ded., st. 10.

miltwaste (milt'wāst), n. [Formerly miltwast (Skinner); appar. < *milt*¹ + waste: so called, it is said, because formerly believed to be a remedy for wasting or disease of the spleen or milt; cf. spleenwort.] The scaly fern, Ceterach Ceterach.

Milvago (mil-vā'gō), n. [NL. (cf. L. milvago, milvago, a kind of fish), < L. milvus, a kite (also a kind of fish): see Milvus.] 1. A genus of South American vulture-hawks, of the family Falconidæ and subfamily Polyborinæ, founded by Spix in 1824. There are two species, M. chimachima and M. chimango.—2. [l. c.] A member of this genus.

Milvinæ (mil-vī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Milvus + -inæ.] A subfamily of Falconidæ, typified by the genus Milvus; the kites. The scapular process of the coracoid does not reach the clavicle, the face is not ruffed, and the beak is not toothed; the tarsus is shorter than the tibia; and the tail is either forked or much shorter than the long pointed wings. The Milvinæ are birds of less than average size for this family, and of comparatively weak organization, preying chiefly upon reptiles, insects, and other humble quarry. There are a number of genera besides Milvus, as Elanus, Elanoides, Nauclerus, Ictinia, etc. See cuts under Elanoides and *kite*¹, 1.

milvine (mil'vin), a. and n. [< L. milvinus, belonging to the kite, < milvus, the kite, a bird of prey.] I. a. Pertaining to the Milvinæ, or having their characters.

II. n. A member of the Milvinæ; any kite.

Milvulus (mil'vū-lus), n. [NL. (Swainson, 1827), dim. of L. milvus, a kite: see Milvus.] A genus of clamatorial birds of the family Tyrannidæ, having an extremely long forficate tail like the kite, whence the name; the scissortails, or swallow-tailed flycatchers. M. tyrannus and M. forficatus are two species. The former is chiefly a tropical American bird, but it sometimes strays into the United States; it is ashy above and white below, the top and sides of the head black, the crown-patch yellow; the tail is black edged with white, and sometimes grows to a foot in length, with a forking of 6 or 8 inches, though the body of the bird is no larger than that of the common king-bird. The other abounds in Texas and southward, sometimes straying through most of the States. It is a very showy bird, of a hoary ash color, paler or white below, variously tinged with crimson or salmon-red, the crown-patch orange or scarlet. The tail is generally 8 or 10 inches long, forked 5 or 6 inches, black and white or rosy. The display it makes in opening and shutting this ornament gives the name scissor-tail.

Fork-tailed Flycatcher (Milvulus tyrannus).

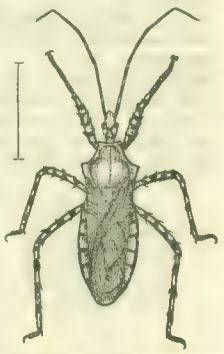
Milvus (mil'vus), n. [NL. (Cuvier, 1800), < L. milvus, a kite.] The typical genus of Milvinæ, having a long forked tail. The leading species is the common kite or glede of Europe, M. ictinus or regalis; M. ater is the black kite of the same continent.

milwell† (mil'wel), n. [Also myllewell; < ME. mulwell; origin obscure; cf. milwyn.] A kind of fish. See the first quotation.



Myllewell, a sort of fish, the same with what in Lincolnshire is called millwyn, which Spelman renders green fish; but it was certainly of a different kind.
Kennett, Paroch. Antiq. Gloss (1695). (Davies.)

Item, ij. saltyng tubbes. Item, viij. lynges. Item, iiij. mulwell-fyche. Paston Letters (Inventory), I. 490.

The yellow ling, the milwell fair and white.
John Dennys (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 166).

milwyn (mil'win), n. [Also millwyn; cf. milwell.] Green fish. Skinner; Halliwell. See the first quotation under milwell. [Prov. Eng.]

Milyas (mil'i-as), n. [NL., < L. Milyas, a district in Lycia.] 1. A genus of noctuid moths, erected by Walker in 1858 for the African M. mixtura.—2. A notable genus of predaceous bugs of the family Reduviidæ. They are mainly American, and M. cinctus is one of the best-known heteropters of the United States, of a waxy or orange-yellow color, with the legs and antennæ banded with black. Stål, 1861.

Many-banded Robber (Milyas cinctus). (Line shows natural size.)

milzbrand (milts'-brant), n. [G., < milz, milt, spleen, + brand, burning inflammation: see *milt*¹ and brand.] Same as malignant anthrax (which see, under anthrax).

mim (mim), a. [A minced form of *mum*¹, silent.] Primly silent; prim; demure; precise; affectedly modest; quiet; mute: also used adverbially. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch.]

See, up he's got the word of God,
An' meek an' mim has view'd it.
Burns, Holy Fair.

Lightning-storms seem to come quite natural to you, for all as prim and mim as you are!
W. Black, In Far Lochaber, iv.

mima (mī'mą), n. [Burmese.] A young Burmese woman; a girl.

Make war or peace; build or burn; . . . only leave me to my mimas and my stranger's drink.
J. W. Palmer, Up and Down the Irrawaddi, p. 161.

Mimas (mī'mas), n. [NL., < Gr. Μίμας, the name of a centaur.] 1. The innermost and smallest of the satellites of Saturn, revolving about its primary in 22 hours 37 minutes.—2. [l. c.] In zoöl., a golden-green South American beetle, Scarabæus mimas.

mimbar, minbar (mim'-, min'bär), n. [Turk. minber = Pers. Hind. mimbar, < Ar. manbar, a pulpit.] The pulpit in a mosque. It consisted originally of a plain low platform approached by three steps, but is now often an elevated structure surmounted by a richly ornamented canopy. It differs from a pulpit especially in that it is entered by stairs in front instead of at the side or in the rear. See cut in next column.

mime (mīm), n. [< F. mime = Sp. Pg. It. mimo, < L. mimus, < Gr. μῖμος, an imitator, actor, also a kind of drama; cf. μιμεῖσθαι, imitate; prob. akin to L. imitari, imitate: see imitate.] 1. An imitator; one skilled in mimicry; a mimic; specifically, a mimic actor; a performer in the ancient farces or burlesques called mimes.

Let him go now and brand another man injuriously with the name of Mime, being himselfe the loosest and most extravagant Mime that hath been heard of; whom no lesse then almost halfe the world could serve for stage roome to play the Mime in.
Milton, Apology for Smectymnuus.

The strolling mimes carried the last, and probably many of the worst, reminiscences of the Roman acting drama across the period of those great migrations which changed the face of the Western world.
A. W. Ward, Eng. Dram. Lit., I. 11.

2. A dramatic entertainment among the ancient Greeks of Sicily and southern Italy and the Romans, consisting generally of farcical mimicry of real events and persons. The Greek mimes combined spoken dialogue of somewhat simple and familiar character with action; the Roman consisted chiefly of action, often of a coarse and even indecent character, with little speaking. See pantomime.

Mimbar in Mosque of Sultan Selim, Adrianople, Turkey.

This we know in Laertius, that the Mimes of Sophron were of such reckning with Plato, as to take them nightly to read on and after make them his pillow. Scaliger describes a Mime to be a Poem imitating any action to stirre up laughter. Milton, Apology for Smectymnuus.

mime (mīm), v. i.; pret. and pp. mimed, ppr. miming. [< mime, n.] To mimic, or play the buffoon; act in a mime.

Acts Old Iniquity, and in the fit
Of miming gets the opinion of a wit.
B. Jonson, Epigrams, cxv.

mimeograph (mim'ē-ō-graf), n. [Irreg. < Gr. μιμεῖσθαι, imitate, + γράφειν, write.] An apparatus invented by Edison, by which stencils of written pages may be obtained for the production of an indefinite number of copies. A pointed stylus is moved as in writing with a lead-pencil over a kind of tough prepared paper placed on a finely grooved steel plate, and the writing is thus traced in a series of minute perforations. Stencils may also be prepared on typewriters.

Mimesa (mī-mē'są), n. [NL. (Shuckard, 1837), irreg. < Gr. μίμησις, imitation: see mimesis.] The typical genus of Mimesidæ, having the inner spur of the hind tibiæ broadly flattened. Thirteen North American and eighteen European species are known.

Mimesidæ (mī-mes'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Mimesa + -idæ.] A family of fossorial hymenopterous insects. The prothorax is narrow, the fore wings have three submarginal cells, the abdomen is petiolate with the petiole depressed and generally furrowed above, the antennal flagellum is thickened at the apex, and the middle tibiæ have only one apical spur. The family is now usually merged with the Crabronidæ.

mimesis (mī-mē'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μίμησις, imitation, < μιμεῖσθαι, imitate: see mime.] 1. In rhet., imitation or reproduction of the supposed words of another, especially in order to represent his character. See prosopœia.—2. In zoöl., mimicry; simulated resemblance; physical or physiological simulation by one animal of another, or of a plant or other part of its surroundings. See mimicry, 3.

mimetene (mim'ē-tēn), n. [So called from its close resemblance to pyromorphite; < Gr. μιμητής, an imitator (see mimetic), + -ene.] Same as mimetite.

Mimetes (mi-mē'tēz), n. [NL., < Gr. μιμητής, an imitator.] 1. In entom.: (a) A genus of noctuid moths. Hübner, 1816. (b) A genus of weevils of the subfamily Otiorhynchinæ. Eschscholtz, 1818.—2. In mammal., a genus of anthropoid apes of the family Simiidæ, a type of which is the chimpanzee: so called from the likeness to man. This genus was proposed by W. E. Leach in 1820, and antedates both Troglodytes of Geoffroy and Anthropopithecus of De Blainville; but it had been used for a genus of Lepidoptera and is antedated by Pan (Oken, 1816). 3. In ornith.: (a) A genus of Australian orioles of the family Oriolidæ. King, 1826. Also Mimeta (Vigors and Horsfield, 1826). (b) Same as Mimus. C. W. L. Gloger, 1842.

mimetesite (mī-met'ē-sīt) n. [Irreg. < Gr. μιμητής, an imitator (see Mimetes), + *-ite*².] Same as mimetite.

mimetic (mī-met'ik), a. [= It. mimetico, < Gr. μιμητικός, imitative, < μιμητής, an imitator, < μιμεῖσθαι, imitate: see mime.] 1. Pertaining to mimicry or imitation; apt in mimicry; aping.

But Fucus, lead by most mimetick apes,
Could not depinge don Fuco's antick shapes.
Whiting, Albino and Bellama, p. 9. (Nares.)

Brotherhoods of actors, ambitious of displaying their mimetic faculty to their townsfolk.
I. D'Israeli, Amen. of Lit., I. 393.

2. Imitating; imitative. Specifically—(a) In zoöl. and bot., exhibiting mimicry; characterized by mimicry, as the flowers of certain orchids which resemble butterflies. See mimicry, 3.

In all these cases it appears that the mimetic species is protected from some enemy by its outward similarity to the form which it mimics. H. A. Nicholson.

(b) In mineral., approximating closely to—that is, imitating—other forms of a higher degree of symmetry. This characteristic usually results from twinning. For example, aragonite occurs in twin crystals which at first sight appear to be hexagonal in form. See pseudosymmetry and twin.

mimetical (mī-met'i-ka̤l), a. [< mimetic + -al.] Same as mimetic.

A dialogue in the old mimetical or poetic form.
Bp. Hurd, Foreign Travel, vii.

mimetically (mī-met'i-ka̤l-i), adv. In a mimetic manner; imitatively; in the manner of a mime.

Homer . . . wished to express mimetically the rolling, thundering, leaping motion of the stone.
De Quincey, Homer, iii.

mimetism (mim'ē-tizm), n. [< mimet-ic, q. v., + -ism.] Same as mimesis, and mimicry, 3.

mimetite (mim'ē-tīt), n. [< Gr. μιμητής, an imitator (see Mimetes), + *-ite*2.] Native arseniate of lead with chlorid of lead, a mineral of a yellow to brown color occurring in hexagonal prismatic crystals, often rounded. It is isomorphous with pyromorphite, the phosphate of lead. Some varieties, as campylite, contain phosphoric acid, and hence are intermediate between mimetite and pyromorphite. Also called mimetesite, mimetene.

mimic (mim'ik), a. and n. [= F. mimique = Sp. mímico = Pg. It. mimico, < L. mimicus, < Gr. μιμικός, belonging to mimes, < μίμος, a mime: see mime.] I. a. 1. Acting as a mime; given to or practising imitation; imitative: as, a mimic actor.

Oft in her absence mimic Fancy wakes
To imitate her [Reason]; but, misjoining shapes, Wild work produces oft, and most in dreams.
Milton, P. L., v. 110.

2. Pertaining to mimicry or imitation; exhibiting, characterized by, or employed in simulation or mimicry; mimicking; simulating: as, the mimic stage; mimic action or gestures.

Eager to win laurels on the mimic theatre of war.
Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., i. 15.

Let the mimic canvas show
Her calm benevolent features.
Bryant, The Ages, iii.

3. Consisting of or resulting from imitation; simulated; mock: often implying a copy or imitation: as, a mimic battle; the mimic royalty of the stage.

Blew mimic hootings to the silent owls,
That they might answer him.
Wordsworth, There was a Boy.

Down the wet streets
Sail their mimic fleets.
Longfellow, Rain in Summer.

Mimic-flower beetles, an occasional name of the Lagriidæ.

II. n. 1. One who or that which imitates or mimics; specifically, an actor.

Anon his Thisbe must be answered,
And forth my mimic comes.
Shak., M. N. D., iii. 2. 19.

Every sort
Of gymnick artists, wrestlers, riders, runners, Jugglers, and dancers, anticks, mummers, mimicks.
Milton, S. A., l. 1325.

2. An imitation; anything copied from or made in imitation of something else.

mimic (mim'ik), v. t.; pret. and pp. mimicked, ppr. mimicking. [< mimic, a.] 1. To act in imitation of; simulate a likeness to; imitate or copy in speech or action, either mockingly or seriously.

Vice has learned so to mimic virtue that it often creeps in hither under its disguise. Steele, Spectator, No. 514.

Mimic the tetchy humour, furtive glance,
And brow where half was furious, half fatigued.
Browning, Ring and Book, I. 203.

2. To produce an imitation of; make something similar or corresponding to; copy in form, character, or quality.

Fresh carved cedar, mimicking a glade
Of palm and plantain, met from either side,
High in the midst. Keats, Lamia, ii.

Leonardo studies the laws of light scientifically, so that the proper roundness and effect of distance should be accurately rendered, and all the subtleties of nature's smiles be mimicked. J. A. Symonds, Italy and Greece, p. 277.

3. Specifically, in zoöl. and bot., to imitate, simulate, or resemble (something else) in form, color, or other characteristic; assume the character or appearance of (some other object). See mimicry, 3.=Syn. 1. Ape, Mock, etc. See imitate.

mimical† (mim'i-ka̤l), a. [< mimic + -al.] Same as mimic.

To some too, if they be far gone, mimical gestures are too familiar. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 233.

To make our mirth the completer, Sir J. Minnes was in the highest pitch of mirth, and his mimicall tricks, that ever I saw, and most excellent pleasant company he is.
Pepys, Diary, II. 339.

mimically (mim'i-ka̤l-i), adv. In a mimicking or imitative manner. [Rare.]

Such are good for nothing but either mimically to imitate their neighbours' fooleries, or to immerse themselves in a kind of lascivious and debauched living.
South, Works, V. ix.

mimicalness (mim'i-ka̤l-nes), n. The quality of being mimical. [Rare.]

mimic-beetle (mim'ik-bē'tl), n. A coleopterous insect which feigns death when disturbed or alarmed, as some of the Histeridæ and Byrrhidæ.

mimicker (mim'i-kėr), n. One who or that which mimics.

mimicry (mim'ik-ri), n.; pl. mimicries (-riz). [< mimic + -ry.] 1. The act of imitating in speech, manner, or appearance; mockery by imitation; simulation.

Absolute princes, who ruin their people by a mimicry of the great monarchs. Hume, Essays, ii. 11.

A few old men, the last survivors of our generation, . . . will remember . . . that exquisite mimicry [of Lord Holland's] which ennobled, instead of degrading.
Macaulay, Lord Holland.

2. An imitation; that which imitates or simulates.

In France an imitative school . . . has executed skilful mimicries of ancient glass painting. Encyc. Brit., X. 673.

3. In zoöl., the simulation of something else in form or color, etc.; mimesis. Commonly called protective mimicry, from the immunity secured by such resemblance, as when the insect known as the walking-stick simulates a dead twig of a tree, when a butterfly assimilates in color to that of the flowers upon which it habitually feeds, or a bird's nest is so constructed as to resemble a bunch of moss on a bough, etc. Also mimetism.

Both mimicry and imitation are [here] used in a metaphorical sense, as implying that close external likeness which causes things unlike in structure to be mistaken for each other. A. R. Wallace, Nat. Select., p. 75.

mimic-thrush (mim'ik-thrush), n. A book-name of the mocking-bird, Mimus polyglottus.

Mimidæ (mim'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Mimus + -idæ.] The Miminé rated as a family of oscine passerine birds.

Miminé (mi-mī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Mimus + -inæ.] A subfamily of turdoid oscine passerine birds, typified by the genus Mimus; the mockers, mock-birds, or mocking-birds. The group is variously located in the ornithological system, being sometimes placed in Turdidæ, sometimes associated with the wrens in Liotrichidæ, and sometimes referred to the Timaliidæ under the name of American babblers. These birds have a moderate (sometimes extremely long and bowed) bill, short wings, long rounded tail, and scutellate tarsi. Leading genera are Mimus, Harporhynchus, Oroscoptes, Galeoscoptes. Familiar examples are the mocking-bird, thrasher, and catbird. All are confined to America. See cuts under catbird and mocking-bird.

mimine (mim'in), a. Of or pertaining to the Miminæ.

mimist† (mī'mist), n. [< mime + -ist.] A writer of mimes.

Thereupon were called Poets Mimistes: as who would say, imitable and meet to be followed for their wise and graue lessons. Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 21.

mimmation (mi-mā'shon), n. [< Ar. mīm, the name of the letter m, + -ation. Cf. mytacism.] The frequent use of the letter m; specifically, the addition of m to a final vowel.

The principal differences between these dialects [the Semitic-Babylonian and the Semitic-Assyrian] are—1st, the use of mimmation by the Babylonians, and not by the Assyrians; thus the Babylonian words Sumirim and Akkadim were rendered by the Assyrians Sumiri and Akkadi.
Eng. Encyc., Arts and Sciences, Supp., p. 173.

mim-mouthed (mim'moutht), a. [Sc. usually mim-mou'ed; < mim + mouthed.] 1. Reserved in discourse: implying affectation of modesty.

I'm no for being mim-mou'd, when there's no reason; but a man had as gude, whiles, cast a knot on his tongue.
The Smugglers, I. 164. (Jamieson.)

2. Affectedly moderate at table. Jamieson.

mimographer (mī-mog'ra̤-fėr), n. [Cf. F. mimographe = Pg. mimographo; < L. mimographus, a writer of mimes, < Gr. μιμογράφος, writing mimes, < μίμος, a mime, + γράφειν, write.] A writer of mimes or farces.

For the best idea that can now be formed of the manner of this famous mimographer we must have recourse, I believe, to the fifteenth Idyl of Theocritus.
Twining, tr. of Aristotle's Treatise on Poetry, I., note 6.

★ Mimosa (mī-mō'zä), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), so called from its imitating the sensibility of animal life; < L. mimus, < Gr. μῖμος, a mimic: see mime, n.] 1. A large genus of leguminous plants of the family Mimosaceæ and the tribe Eumimoseæ, characterized by a legume with entire or jointed valves which break away from a narrow persistent placenta. The plants are either herbs, erect or climbing shrubs, or sometimes trees, and are often prickly. The leaves are almost always bipinnate, but rarely there are none, or the expanded petiole (phyllodium) takes the place of the leaf; and in many species the leaves are sensitive, closing when touched. The flowers are small and sessile, usually having the stamens very much longer than the corolla; they are arranged in globular heads or in cylindrical spikes. About 400 species have been described, natives of the warmer parts of America and Africa, of tropical Asia, and of Australia. Many are cultivated, the most common being the sensitive-plant or humble-plant of hothouses, M. pudica, which is a branching annual, one or two feet in height, having a great many small leaflets, all highly sensitive when touched. M. myriadenia is a woody climber of tropical America, and is remarkable for the great height which it attains.

2. [l. c.] A plant of this genus.

For not Mimosa's tender tree Shrinks sooner from the touch than he.
Scott, Marmion, iv., Int.

mimosa-bark (mī-mō'zä-bärk), n. The bark of several Australian acacia- or wattle-trees, much used in tanning.

Mimosaceæ (mī-mō-zā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Reichenbach, 1832), < Mimosa + -aceæ.] A family of leguminous plants, characterized by small regular flowers with a gamosepalous calyx, by having the petals valvate and often united below the middle, and by having stamens which are free or monadelphous. It embraces about 30 genera and about 1,350 species, the majority of which are confined to the tropics.

mimosite (mī-mō'sīt), n. [< Mimosa + *-ite*2.] A fossil seed-pod supposed to have belonged to a plant of the mimosa family.

mimotype (mim'ō-tīp), n. [< Gr. μῖμος, a mimic, + τύπος, form.] In zoöl. and zoögeog., a type or form of animal life which in one country is the analogue or representative of a type or form found in another country, to which it is not very closely related. Thus, the American starlings (Icteridæ) are mimotypes of the Old World starlings (Sturnidæ); the American genus Geomys is mimotypic of the African Georychus; the American jumping-mouse (Zapus) replaces the jerboas (Dipus) of Africa.

Mimotypes, forms distantly resembling each other, but fulfilling similar functions. . . . By the use of this term, the word "analogue" may be relieved of a part of the burden borne by it. Smithsonian Report (1881), p. 460, note.

mimotypic (mim-ō-tip'ik), a. [< mimotype + -ic.] Having the character of a mimotype.

Mimuleæ (mi-mū'lē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1876), < Mimulus + -eæ.] A subtribe of plants of the family Scrophulariaceæ and the tribe Gratioleæ, characterized by a five-toothed calyx, by having the stamens inserted within the corolla-tube, with the anther-cells contiguous, and by a loculicidal capsule with two or four valves. The subtribe embraces 6 genera, Mimulus being the type, and about 56 species.

Mimulus (mim'ū-lus), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1753), so called from the resemblance of its corolla to a mask; < LL. mimulus, a little mime, dim. of L. mimus: see mime.] A genus of scrophulariaceous plants of the tribe Gratioleæ, type of the subtribe Mimuleæ, characterized by a tubular calyx, which is almost always five-angled or five-toothed, by a two-valved capsule, and by having numerous seeds, with the placentæ usually united to form a central column. They are reclining or erect, rarely tall, and slightly woody herbs, with opposite undivided leaves, and often showy flowers, which are yellow, orange, red, violet, or rose-colored, and solitary in the axils of the leaves, or sometimes racemed at the tips of the branches. The species, numbering about 30, are especially numerous in Pacific North America, but are also widely dispersed elsewhere in temperate regions, though not in Europe. Plants of the genus bear the general name of monkey-flower. M. ringens and M. alatus, with violet-purple flowers, are common species of wet places in the eastern United States. Various species are cultivated, chiefly in conservatories, some much prized. Among them are M. moschatus, the musk-plant of gardens, strongly musk-scented, the flowers small and pale-yellow, and M. cardinalis, with large scarlet corolla. Diplacus glutinosus, a shrubby, ornamental species, with flowers from salmon-colored to scarlet, has been referred to this genus.

Mimus (mī'mus), n. [NL., < L. mimus, < Gr. μῖμος, an imitator: see mime.] A genus of American birds of which the mocking-bird, M. polyglottus, is the type. See mocking-bird, and cut under catbird.

Mimusops (mi-mū′sops), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1753), so called from the fancied resemblances of the flowers to an ape's face; < Gr. μιμοῦς, gen. of μιμώ, an ape (< μιμεῖσθαι, imitate, μῖμος, an imitator: see mime), + ὤψ, face.] A genus of dicotyledonous sympetalous plants of the family Sapotaceæ, type of the tribe Mimusopeæ. It is characterized by having the six or eight segments of the calyx arranged in two series, the outer ones including the inner, which are more slender; the lobes of the corolla entire and three times as many as the calyx-segments; and the six or eight staminodia, which are alternate with the same number of stamens. They are trees, or rarely shrubs, with a milky juice, and usually small white flowers, which are often fragrant, in axillary clusters. About 160 species are known, found throughout the tropics. Several, from India and Ceylon, yield a heavy durable timber, and M. Elengi also produces small edible berries, the seeds of which afford an abundance of oil. See balata-gum, bully-tree, cow-tree, and dilly[3].

min[1]†, pron. A Middle English form of mine[1].

min[2]†, a. [ME., also myn, minne, mynne, < AS. min*, less (not 'small,' the positive form being not in use), = OS. minniro = OFries. minnera, minra (cf. min, adv.) = MD. mindre, D. minder = MLG. min, minner, minder = OHG. minniro, MHG. minner, minre, G. minder = Icel. minnr = Sw. mina[1] (mī′nä), n. [L., also mna, < Gr. μνᾶ, a weight, a sum of money; < Heb. māneh, a weight, prop. part, portion, number, < mānāh, divide, measure out, allot.] A unit of weight and of value, originally Assyrian, but used also by the Greeks and other ancient peoples. Bronze and stone Babylonian and Assyrian standards show that there were two Assyrian minas, one varying from 960 to 1,040 grams, and the other of half that weight. The Assyrians divided the mina into 60 shekels, and 60 minas made a talent. In Athens at the time of Pericles it was, in weight of silver, 100 drachmas, equivalent to 436.3 grams, or 15.4 ounces avoirdupois, or 14+ ounces troy, and was in value about $18.

> [The Babylonians] constituted a new mina for themselves, consisting of 50 shekels instead of 60.
> B. V. Head, Historia Numorum, Int., p. xxxii.

mina[2] (mī′nä), n. [Also mino, myna, mynah, and maina; < Hind. mainā, a starling.] One of several different sturnoid passerine birds of India and countries further east. mind[1] (mīnd), n. [< ME. mind, mynd, mend, mund, < AS. gemynd (not mynd*, as commonly cited, this form, without the prefix, occurring only in derivatives), memory, remembrance, memorial, mind, thought, = Icel. minni (for mindi*), memory, = Sw. minne = Dan. minde (developed from minne, itself from orig. minde*), memory, = Goth. gamunds (also gaminthi), memory; with collective prefix ge-, and formative -d (orig. pp. suffix), < munan (pres. man, pret. munde), also gemunan (geman, etc.), also á-munan, on-munan, remember, be mindful of, consider, think, = OS. farmunan, despise, = Icel. muna = Goth. gamunan, remember: see mine[3]. From the same source are AS. myne, mind, purpose, desire, love, = Icel. munr, mind, desire, love, = Goth. munś, purpose, device, readiness (see minne); all from a Teut. √ man = L. √ men in meminisse, remember (perf. as pres. memini = AS. man, I remember), reminisci, recall to mind, recollect, men(t-)s, mind (a form nearly = E. mind), mentiri, lie, etc., = Gr. √ μεν in μῆνις, wrath, μένος, mind, etc., μνᾶσθαι, remember, etc., = Skt. √ man, think. This is one of the most prolific of the Aryan roots: in E., of AS. or other Teut. origin, are mind[1], remind, min[3], mine[3], minion, mignonette, minikin, minx[1], mean[1], etc.; of L. origin, memento, reminiscence, mental, mention, amentia, demented, comment, commentary, etc., Minerva, etc.; of Gr. origin, mentor, etc. The word man is also usually referred to this root: see man.] 1. That which feels, wills, and thinks; the conscious subject; the ego: the soul. Some writers make an obscure distinction between mind, soul, and spirit. With them the mind is the direct subject of consciousness.

For to say truely what els is man but his minde? which, whosoeuer haue skil to compasse and make yeelding and flexible, what may not he commaund the body to perfourme? Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 164.

Mind, therefore, is to be understood as the subject of the various internal phænomena of which we are conscious, or that subject of which consciousness is the general phænomenon Consciousness is, in fact, to the mind what extension is to matter or body. Though both are phænomena, yet both are essential qualities: for we can neither conceive mind without consciousness, nor body without extension. Sir W. Hamilton, Metaphysics, ix.

By the mind of a man, we understand that in him which thinks, remembers, reasons, wills.
Reid, Intellectual Powers, i. 1.

By the Human Mind are to be understood its two faculties called, respectively, the understanding and the will.
Swedenborg, Christian Psychol. (tr. by Gorman), p. 80.

The idea I have of the human mind, in so far as it is a thinking thing, and not extended in length, breadth, and depth, and participating in none of the properties of body, is incomparably more distinct than the idea of any corporeal object Descartes, Meditations (tr. by Veitch), iv.

In psychology, on the other hand, the individual mind may mean either (i.) the series of feelings, or "mental phenomena" above referred to; or (ii.) the subject of these feelings, for whom they are phenomena; or (iii.) the subject of these feelings or phenomena + the series of feelings or phenomena themselves, the two being in that relation to each other in which alone the one is subject and the other a series of feelings, phenomena, or objects.
J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 39.

Mind consists of feelings and the relations among feelings. H. Spencer, Data of Ethics, § 41.

Whatever all men inevitably mean by the word "I" (the empirical ego of philosophy), whenever they say I think, or feel, or intend this or that; and whatever they understand others to mean by using similar language — thus much, and no more, we propose at first to include under the term mind. G. T. Ladd, Physiol. Psychology, Int., p. 4.

Mind is the sum of our processes of knowing, our feelings of pleasure and pain, and our voluntary doings.
J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 2.

2. The intellect, or cognitive faculty or part of the soul, as distinguished from feeling and volition; intelligence. The old psychologists made intellect and will the only faculties of the soul.

Years that bring the philosophic mind.
Wordsworth, Immortality.

Wordsworth says of him [Milton] that "His soul was as a star and dwelt apart." But I should rather be inclined to say that it was his mind that was alienated from the present. Lowell, New Princeton Rev., I. 154.

3. The field of consciousness; contemplation; thought; opinion.

Yesterday he thought so moche in his minde on her that in the houre of euyn songe he gaf to her in Iapyng a buffet. Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 168.

Pity melts the mind to love.
Dryden, Alexander's Feast, l. 96.

5. Intention; purpose.

The Duke had a very noble and honourable mynde alwayes to pay his debts well, and when he lacked money, would not stick to sell the greatest part of his plate.
Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 230.

Her mind to them again she briefly doth unfold.
Drayton, Polyolbion, i. 168.

Who can beleive that whole Parlament's elected by the People from all parts of the Land, should meet in one mind, and resolution not to advise him but to conspire against him? Milton, Likonoklastes, xv.

My lady herself is of no mind in the world, and for that reason her woman is of twenty minds in a moment.
Steele, Spectator, No. 137.

Religious bodies which have a mind of their own, and are strong enough to make it felt.
H. N. Oxenham, Short Studies, p. 405.

6. Memory; remembrance: as, to call to mind; to have, to keep, or to bear in mind.

He puts me in mind of the picture of the great ox in a gilt frame. Bulwer Pelham, xli.

Unconscious mind. See unconscious. — Syn. Mind, Intellect, Soul, Spirit, reason, sense, brains. Primarily, mind is opposed to matter, intellect to feeling and will, soul to body, and spirit to flesh. The old division of the powers of the mind was into intellect, sensibilities, and will: mind is variously used to cover all or some of these, but when less than the whole is meant it is chiefly the intellect: as, he seems to have very little mind. Yet mind is sometimes used with principal reference to the will: as I have half a mind to go. Where spirit and soul differ, spirit applies rather to moral force, and soul to depth and largeness of feeling. (See soul.) In the New Testament soul is used to translate a word covering all life, whether physical or spiritual, as in Mat. x. 28. Upon the highest usage in the Scriptures is founded the common representation of man as immortal by the word soul. Hence soul is used for the central, essential, or life-giving part of anything: as, he was the soul of the party. The definitions under each of these words should be studied to get its range and idiomatic uses. See reason.

mind[1] (mīnd), v. [< ME. minden, munden, < AS. myndgian, gemyndgian, gemyndigian (= OHG. gemuntigōn), bear in mind, recollect, recall to another's mind, remind (cf. mind-stuff (mīnd'stuf), n. A supposed substance or quasi-material which by its differentiations constitutes mind.

When matter takes the complex form of a living human brain, the corresponding mind-stuff takes the form of a human consciousness, having intelligence and volition.
W. K. Clifford, Lectures, II. 85.

mind-transference (mīnd'tràns'fėr-ens), n. Thought-transference. See telepathy.

Some experiments on the subject of mind-transference, or the occasional communication of mental impressions independently of ordinary perceptions, under peculiar and rare nervous conditions. Science, VIII. 559.

mine[1] (mīn), pron. [In defs. 1 and 2, orig. gen. of I[2], < ME. min, myn, < AS. mīn (= OS. OFries. mīn = D. mijn = MLG. mīn = OHG. MHG. mīn, G. mein (also OHG. mīnēr, MHG. mīner, G. meiner) = Icel. minn = Sw. Dan. min = Goth. meina), genitive, associated with nom. ic, I, dat. mē, me, etc.; prob. orig. an adj., with adj. suffix -n, from the root of me: see me[1], I[2]. In defs. 3, etc., merely poss. (adj.), < ME. min, myn, mine, myne, < AS. mīn, etc., = Goth. meins, mine, my; from the genitive. Hence, by loss of the final consonant, my.] 1. Of me; me; the original genitive (objective) of I. It was formerly used with some verbs where later usage requires me.

I was in Surrye a syr, and sett be myne one
As soverayne and seyngnour of sere kynges londis.
Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), l. 3313.

2. Of me; belonging to me. The independent possessive form of the first personal me, corresponding to my as attributive before the thing possessed: as, that (the thing spoken of or indicated) is mine (is of me, belongs to me, or is my thing); these books are all mine (my property): in this use now virtually an elliptical use of mine in def. 3.

My doctrine is not mine [of me], but his [of him] that sent me. John vii. 16.

3. Belonging to me: merely possessive, and construed as an adjective, preceding its noun, which may, however, be omitted. When the noun is expressed, the form is in ordinary use now reduced to my, the older form mine being rarely used except archaically before a vowel or h, or by a familiar transposition after the noun, as in sister mine, baby mine, etc.

Myn heritage mote I nedes selle,
And ben a beggere, here may I nat dwelle.
Chaucer, Franklin's Tale, l. 835.

I will encamp about mine house. Zeph. ix. 8.

Mam, mother-mine, or mammie, as children first call their mothers. Florio, p. 297. (Halliwell.)

Mi perdonato, gentle master mine.
Shak., T. of the S., i. 1. 25.

Shall I not take mine ease in mine inn but I shall have my pocket picked? Shak., 1 Hen. IV., iii. 3. 93.

Mine own romantic town! Scott, Marmion, iv. 30.

We sent mine host to purchase female gear.
Tennyson, Princess, i.

Like the other possessives in the independent form, mine preceded by of constitutes a double genitive of the possessor in the first person and any word understood denoting appurtenance or possession: as, a horse of mine (belonging to me); it is no fault of mine.

Upon a wretch whose natural gifts were poor
To those of mine. Shak., Hamlet, i. 5. 52.

By ellipsis, the possessive mine is used (like other possessives) — (1) To avoid repetition of the name of the thing possessed: as, your hand is stronger than mine (my hand).

Fleme them not fro oure companye,
Sen thyne are myne and myne er thyne.
York Plays, p. 458.

The remnant . . . shall know whose words shall stand, mine [my words], or their's. Jer. xliv. 28.

Mine and my father's death come not upon thee.
Shak., Hamlet, v. 2. 341.

(2) To express generally 'that which belongs to me,' 'my possession, property, or appurtenance.'

Bothe to me and to myne mykull vnright,
And to yow & also yours 3omeryng for euer.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 1721.

He shall glorify me: for he shall receive of mine, and shall show it unto you. John xvi. 14.

If you like me, she shall have me and mine.
Shak., T. of the S., ii. 1. 385.

★Of mine. See of.

mine[2] (mīn), n. [< ME. mine, myne = D. mijn = G. Dan. mine = Sw. mina, < F. mine = Sp. Pg. It. mina, < ML. mina, a mine, < minare, open a mine, lead from place to place: see mine[2], v.] 1. An excavation in the earth made for the purpose of getting metals, ores, or coal. Mine-work, in metal-mines, consists in sinking shafts and winzes, running levels, and stoping out the contents of the vein thus made ready for removal. In coal-mining the operations differ in detail from those carried on in connection with metal-mines, but are the same in principle. The details vary in coal-mining with the position and thickness of the beds. A mine differs from a quarry in that the latter is usually open to the day; but in any mine a part of the excavations may be an openwork (see that word), as in running an adit-level, which may be carried to a considerable distance before becoming covered by earth or rock. When the term mine is used, it is generally understood that the excavation so named is in actual course of exploitation; otherwise some qualifying term like abandoned is required. No occurrence of ore is designated as a mine unless something has been done to develop it by actual mining operations. There are certain excavations which are called neither mines nor quarries, as, for instance, places where clay is being dug out for bricks; such places are frequently (especially in England) called pits, and also openworks. With few and not easily specified exceptions, a quarry is a place where building-stone, or building-materials of any kind (as lime, cement, etc.), are being got; a mine, where coal, ore, or some useful mineral is in the process of exploitation. The term mine includes excavations designated by the French as mines, as well as some of those called by them minières; quarry is the equivalent of the French carrière. The term mine is sometimes extended in use to include the ores as well as the excavation.

And alle be it that men fynden gode Dyamandes in Ynde, zit natheles men fynden hem more comounly upon the Roches in the See, and upon Hilles where the Myne of Gold is. Mandeville, Travels, p. 158.

I would not wed her for a mine of gold.
Shak., T. of the S., i. 2. 92.

2. Milit.: (a) A subterraneous gallery or passage dug under the wall or rampart of a fortification, for the lodgment of a quantity of powder or other explosive to be used in blowing up the works. (b) Such an excavation when charged with an explosive, or the charge of explosive

Section of a Mine.
AIKB, crater; AB, crater-opening; CB, radius of the crater; AO, radius of explosion; O, charge; OD, OF, radii of rupture.

used in such a mine, or sunk under water in operations of naval defense to serve a similar purpose to mines on land. The radius of explosion of such a mine is the straight line drawn from the center of the charge of a mine to the edge of the crater; the radius of rupture is the distance from the center to the curved surface to which the disturbance caused by the explosion extends.

The walls and ramparts of earth, which a mine had broaken and crumbled, were of prodigious thicknesse.
Evelyn, Diary, Aug. 7, 1641.

With daring Feet, on springing Mines they tread
Of secret Sulphur, in dire Ambush laid.
Congreve, On the Taking of Namure.

3. Figuratively, an abounding source or store of anything.

My God, that art
The royal mine of everlasting treasure.
Quarles, Emblems, iv. 3.

The Assizes of Jerusalem will always remain a mine of feudal principles, and a treasure to scientific jurists.
Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 170.

4. An excavation made by an insect, as a leaf-miner.—5. A mineral. [Prov. Eng.]—6. Ore. [Prov. Eng.]

Take the myn of antymony aforeseid, and make therof al so sotil a poudre as 3e kan.
Book of Quinte Essence (ed. Furnivall), p. 10.

Thus, with Cleveland ironstone containing after calcination some 40 per cent. of iron, about 11 cwts. of limestone are usually requisite per ton of pig iron, or about 22 per cent. of the weight of mine used.
Encyc. Brit., XIII. 297.

Common mine (milit.), a mine in which the radius of the crater, or circular opening produced by the explosion, is equal to the line of least resistance — that is, the shortest line from the center of the charge to the surface of the ground.—Contact mine, a submarine mine designed to be exploded by contact with a ship's bottom or side.—Electrical mine, a charge or series of charges of explosive used for mining and exploded by electricity; a submerged torpedo which can be exploded electrically from a distant point.—Electro-contact mine, a submarine mine designed to be exploded electrically when in contact with a ship's bottom, the contact of the vessel automatically completing the electric circuit.—Electro-mechanical mine, a submarine mine differing from an electro-contact mine in that the battery is contained in the mine itself instead of being outside of it, on the shore.

Electro-mechanical mines can be made by placing a voltaic battery inside the mine itself and joining it up to a fuse and circuit-closer, the circuit-closer completing the circuit when the mine is struck. Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 450.

Fairy of the mine. See fairy.—Mine-locomotive. See locomotive.—Observation mine, a submarine mine which is exploded by an operator on shore and not by contact.—Overcharged or surcharged mine (milit.), a mine that produces a crater the radius of which is greater than the line of least resistance.—Submarine mine, a defensive torpedo.—The Bonanza mines. See bonanza.—Undercharged mine (milit.), a mine that upon explosion produces a crater the radius of which is less than the line of least resistance.

mine[2] (mīn), v.; pret. and pp. mined, ppr. mining. [< ME. minen, mynen, < OF. miner, F. miner = Sp. Pg. minar = It. minare (= G. minen), mine, < ML. minare, open a mine, lead from place to place, < LL. minare, drive (as by threats), < L. minari, threaten, < minæ, threats: see menace; cf. minatory, etc. In part the verb is due to the noun.] I. intrans. 1. To dig a mine or pit in the earth, in order to obtain minerals or to make a blast for explosion, as in a military mine; work in a mine.

The enemy mined, and they countermined.
Raleigh, Hist. World, V. iii. 19.

2. To burrow; form a lodgment by burrowing: as, the sand-martin mines to make a nest.—3. Figuratively, to work in secret; work by secret or insidious means.

Efter that his manhood and his pyne
Made love withinne her herte for to myne.
Chaucer, Troilus, ii. 677.

Mining fraud shall find no way to creep
Into their fenced ears with grave advice.
Sackville, Gorboduc, i. 2.

II. trans. 1. To make by digging or burrowing.

In the time of Antecrist, a Fox schalle make there his trayne, and mynen an hole, where Kyng Alisandre leet make the Zates. Mandeville, Travels, p. 267.

O'er the solid sheets of marble gray.
Scott, Rokeby, ii. 2.

2. To dig away or otherwise remove the foundation from; undermine; sap: as, to mine the walls of a fort.

Merke sythene over the mounttez in-to his mayne londez,
To Meloyne the mervaylous, and myne doune the walles.
Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), l. 428.

The Prussians arrived, mined the arches, and attempted to blow up the bridge, sentinels and all.
Greville, Memoirs, Dec. 10, 1820.

3. To dig mines under, for the reception of explosives, as in mining or engineering works, and in military and naval operations.

Old Parr Street is mined, sir,—mined! And some morning we shall be blown into blazes — into blazes, sir; mark my words! Thackeray, Adventures of Philip, vii.

There are many places where no sort of stationary mines could possibly survive a gale, and although the waters may be reported as mined in all directions, a bold test would show them to be clear of such dangers.
N. A. Rev., CXLI. 274.

4. Figuratively, to ruin or destroy by slow or secret methods.

Whiles rank corruption, mining all within,
Infects unseen. Shak., Hamlet, iii. 4. 148.

Rending friends asunder,
Dividing families, betraying counsels,
Whispering false lies, or mining men with praises.
B. Jonson, Volpone, iii. 1.

mine[3]† (mīn), v. t. [< ME. minen, mynen, munen, < AS. gemynan, remember, cf. gemunan, remember: see min[3], mind[1], mint[3], etc.] Same as mind[1].

mine-captain (mīn′kap″tān), n. The overseer of a mine.

mine-chamber (mīn′chām″bėr), n. Milit., the place where the explosive charge is deposited in a mine.

mine-dial (mīn′dī″al), n. See dial, 8.

mine-man† (mīn′man), n. A miner.

I speak in other papers as if there may be a volatile gold in some ores and other minerals, where the mine-men do not find anything of that metal. Boyle, Works, III. 99.

mineon†, n. An obsolete form of minion[1].

miner (mī′nėr), n. [< ME. minour, mynour, mynor, < OF. minour, menour, F. mineur, < ML. minator (cf. Sp. minero = Pg. mineiro, < ML. minarius), a miner, < minare, mine: see mine[2], v.] 1. One who mines; a person engaged in digging for metals or minerals, or in forming a military or other mine.

Mynors of marbull ston & mony other thinges.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 1532.

2. In zoöl., an insect that mines: chiefly in composition: as, a leaf-miner.—Miners' inch. See inch[1].

mineral (min′e-ral), n. and a. [= D. mineraal = G. Sw. Dan. mineral, < OF. mineral, F. minéral = Sp. Pg. mineral = It. minerale, a mineral, < ML. minerale, also minorale, a mineral, ore, also a mine (often in pl. mineralia, minoralia, > OF. minerailles, minerals), prop. neut. of mineralis, adj. (which, however, occurs much later than the noun), < minera, mineria (after Rom.), prop. minaria, minarium, a mine, also a mineral (> It. Sp. minera = OF. miniere, a mine, F. minière, > G. miner, a mineral, ore), fem. and neut. respectively of an adj. minarius, pertaining to a mine (as a noun, minarius, m., a miner: see miner), equiv. to mina, a mine, < minare, mine, open a mine: see mine[2].] I. n. 1. Any constituent of the earth's crust; more specifically, an inorganic body occurring in nature, homogeneous and having a definite chemical composition which can be expressed by a chemical formula, and further having certain distinguishing physical characters. A mineral is in almost every case a solid body, and, if it has been formed under suitable conditions, it has, besides its definite chemical composition, a definite molecular structure, which is exhibited externally in its crystalline form and also internally in its cleavage, its behavior with respect to light (optical properties), heat-propagation, electricity, etc. Furthermore, it has other characters, which may belong to it even when amorphous (though sometimes modified by crystallization), as specific gravity, hardness, fracture, tenacity, luster, color, fusibility, etc. A certain variation in physical characters is consistent with the identity of a mineral species, but if the same substance, as calcium carbonate in calcite and in aragonite, occurs in two or more groups of crystals which cannot be referred to the same fundamental form, each is ranked as a distinct species. A difference in specific gravity and in some other physical characters usually accompanies the difference in crystallization. How great a variation in chemical composition, as by isomorphous replacement, is consistent with the identity of a single mineral species is a point about which opinion differs: some authors treat the garnets (all of which have the same form and the same general formula) as a group of related species, and others as varieties of a single species. Chemical compounds formed in the laboratory or in the arts are not regarded as minerals; but where such compounds as are already known as occurring in nature are thus formed they are usually called artificial minerals. Much attention has been devoted of recent years to the artificial reproduction of minerals, but almost solely as a matter of scientific interest, and as throwing light on the processes of nature.

2†. A mine.

His very madness, like some ore
Among a mineral of metals base, Shows itself pure. Shak., Hamlet, iv. 1 26.

Shall it not be a wild fig in a wall,
Or fired brimstone in a mineral?
Bp. Hall, Satires, vi.

Acidiferous mineral. See acidiferous.—Adipocere mineral. See adipocere.—Æthiops mineral†. See æthiops.—Agaric, bezoar, chameleon, etc., mineral. See the qualifying words.—Altered mineral, one which has undergone more or less chemical change under the processes of nature. The investigation of the alteration of minerals and of the pseudomorphous minerals (see pseudomorph and pseudomorphism) thus formed is a prominent branch of mineralogy.—Crystal mineral, sel de prunelle, a mixture of potassium nitrate and sulphate.—Mineral-deposit, any valuable mass of ore. Like ore-deposit, it may be used with reference to any mode of occurrence of ore, whether having the characters of a true, segregated, or gash vein, or of any other form in which ores are found occurring. See ore-deposit.—Torbane Hill mineral. Same as Boghead coal (which see, under coal).

II. a. 1. Having the nature or character of a mineral as defined above; obtained from a mineral or minerals; belonging to the class of minerals; consisting of minerals: as, a mineral substance; the mineral kingdom. Coal dug from the earth is sometimes called mineral coal, to distinguish it from charcoal, which is artificially prepared by charring wood.

The lofty lines abound with endless store
Of mineral treasure.
Sir R. Blackmore, Creation, iii.

2. Impregnated with minerals or mineral matter: as, mineral waters; a mineral spring.—Mineral acids, a name given to sulphuric, nitric, and hydrochloric acids.—Mineral alkali. Same as soda.—Mineral black, an impure variety of carbon, of gray-black color, sometimes used as a pigment.—Mineral blue. See blue.—Mineral candle. See candle.—Mineral caoutchouc, a variety of bitumen, intermediate between the harder and softer kinds. It sometimes much resembles india-rubber in its softness and elasticity, hence its name. It occurs near Castleton in Derbyshire. Also called elaterite.—Mineral chameleon. See chameleon.—Mineral charcoal. Same as mother-of-coal (which see, under coal).—Mineral coal. See II., 1, and coal, 2.—Mineral cotton, a fiber formed by allowing a jet of steam to escape through a stream of liquid slag, by which the slag is blown into fine white threads. It is a poor conductor of heat, and is therefore suggested as a covering for steam-boilers and -pipes. (E. H. Knight.) A variety with short fiber is called mineral wool, and is used as a non-conductor of heat, a deafening for floors of buildings, etc.—Mineral flax. See asbestos.—Mineral gray. See gray.—Mineral greens. See green[1].—Mineral kingdom, that one of the three grand divisions of natural objects which consists of minerals or inorganic bodies, and of which mineralogy is the science, as distinguished from the vegetable and animal kingdoms.—Mineral oil. Same as kerosene.—Mineral pitch, a solid softish bitumen. See asphaltum, and elastic mineral pitch, under elastic.—Mineral salt, a salt of a mineral acid.—Mineral solution, arsenical liquor, or liquor potassæ arsenitis.—Mineral tallow. Same as hatchettin, 1.—Mineral tar, in mineral., bitumen of the consistency of tar. See maltha and bitumen.—Mineral waters, a name given to certain spring-waters so far impregnated with foreign substances as to have a decided taste and a peculiar operation on the physical economy. The ingredients contained in the principal mineral springs of the United States are gases, carbonates, sulphates, chlorids, oxid of iron, and silica. Mineral waters may in most cases be imitated artificially.—Mineral wax. Same as ozocerite.—Mineral wool. See mineral cotton.—Mineral yellow, a pigment made of oxid and chlorid of lead, obtained by digesting powdered litharge in a solution of common salt, washing, drying, and fusing the product. Also known as Turner's yellow, Montpellier yellow, Cassel yellow, patent yellow.

mineral-dresser (min′ē-ral-dres″ėr), n. A small machine for trimming geological specimens. It consists of a strong frame with two opposed chisels, between which the specimen is placed; one of the chisels, after being adjusted at the proper distance, remains fixed, while the other, which is attached to a lever worked by a screw, is pressed with great force against it.

mineral-holder (min′ē-ral-hōl″dėr), n. A device for exposing small pieces of stone, ores, etc., under a microscope. It consists of two clamps or spindles pivoted so that the object held in them can be revolved readily.

mineralisable, mineralisation, etc. See mineralizable, etc.

mineralist (min′ē-ral-ist), n. [< F. minéraliste = It. mineralista; as mineral + -ist.] One who studies or is skilled in minerals; a mineralogist.

It is the part of a mineralist both to discover new mines and to work those that are already discovered.
Boyle, Origin of Forms, Proemial Discourse.

A mine-digger may meet with a gem or a mineral which he knows not what to make of till he shews it a jeweller or a mineralist. Boyle.

mineralizable (min′ē-ral-ī-za-bl), a. [< mineralize + -able.] Capable of being mineralized. Also spelled mineralisable.

mineralization (min″ē-ral-i-zā′shon), n. [= F. minéralisation = Sp. mineralización = Pg. mineralisação = It. mineralizzazione; as mineralize + -ation.] The act or process of mineralizing; the process of converting or being converted into a mineral, as a metal into an oxid, sulphuret, or other ore. The conversion of vegetable matter into coal is not properly mineralization, although sometimes so called. Proper mineralization of vegetable matter does take place, however, as when wood is converted into opal, or becomes silicified, as very frequently happens under certain conditions. This is commonly and properly called fossilization or petrifaction, and more rarely mineralization. Also spelled mineralisation.

Some phenomena seem to imply that the mineralization must proceed with considerable rapidity, for stems of a soft and succulent character, and of the most perishable nature, are preserved in flint.
Lyell, Elements of Geology, I. 92.

★ mineralize (min′ē-ral-īz), v.; pret. and pp. mineralized, ppr. mineralizing. [= F. minéraliser = Sp. Pg. mineralizar = It. mineralizzare; as mineral + -ize.] I. trans. To change from the metallic character to that of an ore. Thus tin, a white metal, becomes very dark-colored and unmetallic in appearance when mineralized by oxygen, as it is in the common ore of that metal.

II. intrans. To go on a mineralogical excursion; make an excursion with the view of collecting minerals.

★ Also spelled mineralise.

mineralizer (min′ē-ral-ī-zėr), n. A substance or agent that mineralizes; a substance that combines with a metal to form an ore. The principal mineralizer is sulphur, and combinations of the metals with this substance form the most common ores, especially at some depth below the surface. Near the surface the sulphureted ores are usually found to have been changed to oxids and carbonates. Some metals (as tin) are almost exclusively mineralized by oxygen; others (as iron) are extensively mineralized by both oxygen and sulphur. Arsenic, antimony, and chlorin are other important mineralizers. Some metals (as silver) exist in combinations containing sulphur, arsenic, and antimony, all combined with the metal to form one mineral species. Also spelled mineraliser.

Silver, tin, copper, lead, zinc, and iron are obtained almost exclusively in the form of ores—that is, in combination with a mineralizer, of which the most common one is sulphur.
J. D. Whitney, Metallic Wealth of the United States, p. 81.

mineralogic (min″ē-ra-loj′ik), a. [= F. minéralogique = Sp. mineralógico = Pg. mineralogico; as mineralogy + -ic.] Same as mineralogical.

mineralogical (min″ē-ra-loj′i-kal), a. [< mineralogic + -al.] Pertaining to mineralogy or the science of minerals: as, a mineralogical table.

mineralogically (min″ē-ra-loj′i-kal-i), adv. According to the principles of, or with reference to, mineralogy.

mineralogist (min-ē-ral′ō-jist), n. [= F. minéralogiste = Sp. Pg. It. mineralogista; as mineralog-y + -ist.] 1. One who is versed in the science of minerals, or one who treats or discourses of the properties of mineral bodies.

The exactest mineralogists have rejected it.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 1.

2. In conch., a conchologist or carrier-shell; any member of the family Xenophoridæ (or Phoridæ). See cut under carrier-shell.

mineralogize (min-ē-ral′ō-jīz), v. i.; pret. and pp. mineralogized, ppr. mineralogizing. [< mineralog-y + -ize.] To collect mineralogical specimens; study mineralogy.

He was botanizing or mineralogizing with O'Toole's chaplain. Miss Edgeworth, Ennui, xi.

mineralogy (min-ē-ral′ō-ji), n. [< F. minéralogie (> Sp. mineralogía = Pg. It. mineralogia), for minéralologie*, < minéral, mineral, + Gr. -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The science which treats of the properties of mineral species (see mineral), which teaches how to characterize, distinguish, and classify them, and which investigates their occurrence in nature with reference to their mode of formation (paragenesis) and the alteration which they may have undergone. Taken broadly, it includes also, as a branch, lithology, the object of which is the investigation of minerals in their mutual relations as parts of rock-masses. The investigation of rock-masses with respect to their history or occurrence as parts of the crust of the earth belongs to geology.—Chemical mineralogy, the investigation of the chemical composition of minerals, their method of formation, and the changes they undergo when acted upon chemically either in the laboratory or in nature.—Descriptive mineralogy, that branch of the science of mineralogy which is devoted to the description of the physical and chemical properties of mineral species.—Determinative mineralogy, that branch of the science of mineralogy which has as its object the determination of mineral species by means of appropriately arranged tables, based upon their physical and chemical characters.—Physical mineralogy, the science of the physical properties of minerals—that is, of their properties as related to cohesion, heat, light, electricity, etc. It includes, as special branches, crystallography and optical mineralogy.

Minerva (mi-nėr′vä), n. [L. Minerva, OL. Menerva, Etruscan Menerfa; prob., with formative -va, < menes-* = Gr. μένος, mind, spirit, force, etc., < √ men-, think, as found in men(t-)s, mind, meminisse, remember, etc.: see mind[1], n.] In Rom. myth., one of the three chief divinities, the other two being Jupiter and Juno. The chief seat of the cult of all three was the great temple on the Capitoline Hill. Minerva was a virgin, the daughter of Jupiter, the supreme god, and hence was identified, as the Romans came more and more under the influence of Hellenic culture, with the Greek Athene (or Athena), or Pallas, the goddess of wisdom, of war, and of the liberal arts. Like Athene, Minerva was represented in art with a grave and majestic countenance, armed with helmet, shield, and spear, and wearing long full drapery, and on her breast the ægis. See cut under Athene.—Bird of Minerva, the owl.—Minerva Press, a printing-press formerly in Leadenhall Street, London; also, a class of ultra-sentimental novels, remarkable for their intricate plots, published from about 1790 to 1810 at this press, and other productions of similar character.

minerval† (mi-nėr′val), n. [< F. minerval, tuition fees, < L. minerval, a gift in return for instruction, < Minerva, the goddess of wisdom: see Minerva.] Entrance-money given for teaching. Bailey, 1731.

The chief minerval which he bestowed upon that society.
Bp. Hacket, Abp. Williams, I. 96.

minery† (mī′nėr-i), n. [< mine[2] + -ery.] Mines collectively; a mining district or its belongings; a quarry.

Neere this we were shew'd a hill of alume, where is one of the best mineries, yielding a considerable revenue.
Evelyn, Diary, Feb. 7, 1645.

minette (mi-net′), n. [F.] A kind of syenite in which brown mica is very prominent.

minever†, n. An obsolete form of miniver.

ming[1] (ming), v.; pret. and pp. minged, older forms meint, ment. [Early mod. E. also minge, meng; < ME. mingen, mengen, myngen (pp. menged, meynd, meint, meynt), < AS. mengan = OS. mengian = OFries. mengia, menzia = D. MLG. mengen = OHG. mengan, MHG. G. mengen = Icel. menga = Sw. mänga = Dan. mænge, mix, mingle; associated with AS. gemang, gemong, a mingled throng, crowd, assembly (whence on gemang, on gemong, or simply gemang, gemong, among: see among), = G. gemenge, a crowd (see mong[1]), from a root not found outside of Teut., unless it be a nasalized form with diff. vowel of the root of mix, which is improbable. No connection with many can be made out. Hence mingle.] I. trans. 1. To mix; mingle.

Of erthe and eir hit is mad i-medelet to-gedere,
With wynt and with watur ful wittiliche i-meint.
Piers Plowman (A), x. 4.

Take juce of henbane
With soure aysell, and hem togeder mengeth.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 32.

And so together he would minge his pride and povertee.
Kendall's Poems (1577), G 1. (Nares.)

Till with his elder brother Themis
His brackish waves be meynt.
Spenser, Shep. Cal., July.

2. To trouble; disturb.

II. intrans. To mix; mingle.

With the Scottis gan he menge, and stifly stode in stoure.
Rob. of Brunne, p. 298.

Which never mings
With other stream.
Sir A. Gorge, tr. of Lucan. (Nares.)

[Obsolete or prov. Eng. in all uses.]

ming[1]†, n. [Also minge; < ming[1], v.] Mixture.

Like the ore in the ile Choos, which is pure in the minge but dross in the furnace.
Greene, Tritameron of Love (1587).

ming[2]† (ming), v. [Also minge; < ME. mingen, mengen, mungen, munezen, < AS. mynegian, myngian, gemynegian (cf. OHG. bi-munigōn), bring to mind, have in mind, myne, mind, gemyne, mindful, < gemunan, remember (see mine[3]); mixed in ME. with AS. myndgian, gemyndgian, bear in mind, put in mind, < gemynd, mind: see mind[1].] I. trans. To speak of; mention; tell; relate.

Hee minges his metyng amonges hem all,
And what it might bee too meane the menne gan hee ask.
Alisaunder of Macedoine (E. E. T. S.), l. 839.

Could never man work thee a worser shame
Than once to minge thy father's odious name.
Bp. Hall, Satires, IV. ii. 80.

II. intrans. To speak; tell; talk; discourse.

Than tid on a time as this tale minges,
That William went til this gardin his wo fort slake.
William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 787.

mingle (ming′gl), v.; pret. and pp. mingled, ppr. mingling. [Early mod. E. also mingil, mengle; < ME. mengelen* (not found) = D. mengelen = MHG. G. mengeln, in comp. vermengeln, mingle; freq. of ming[1].] I. trans. 1. To mix; blend; combine intimately; form a combination of.

They gave him vinegar to drink mingled with gall.
Mat. xvii. 34.

We'll mingle our bloods together in the earth.
Shak., Pericles, i. 2. 113.

I should advise all English-men that intend to travell into Italy, to mingle their wine with water.
Coryat, Crudities, I. 96.

He looked at her with an expression of mingled incredulity and mortification.
Jane Austen, Pride and Prejudice, p. 165.

2. To form by mixing or blending; combine the parts or ingredients of; compound or concoct.

Men of strength to mingle strong drink. Isa. v. 22.

Flowers of more mingled hue
Than her purfled scarf can shew.
Milton, Comus, l. 994.

3. To bring into relation or association; connect or conjoin.

Those that mingle reason with your passion
Must be content to think you old.
Shak., Lear, ii. 4. 238.

I owe you so much of my health, as I would not mingle you in any occasion of impairing it. Donne, Letters, vi.

4. To confuse; impair or spoil by mixture with something.

This is the mark at the which the devil shooteth, to evacuate the cross of Christ, and to mingle the institution of the Lord's supper. Latimer, Sermon of the Plough.

The best of us appear contented with a mingled imperfect virtue. Rogers, Sermons.

=Syn. 1 and 2. Mingle, Mix, Blend. Mingle and mix are often quite synonymous; where they differ, mix is likely to be found to indicate a more complete loss of individuality by that which is joined with something else. Blend vividly suggests the joining of two or more colors to form a third, and so a passing of two or more sounds, qualities, or the like into each other in such a way as to produce a result partaking of the qualities of each.

II. intrans. 1. To be or become joined, combined, or mixed; enter into combination or intimate relation: as, to mingle with society; oil and water will not mingle.

What, girl! though grey Do something mingle with our younger brown, yet ha' we
A brain that nourishes our nerves.
Shak., A. and C., iv. 8. 19.

I heard the wrack,
As earth and sky would mingle.
Milton, P. R., iv. 453.

2. To be formed by mixing or blending. [Rare.]

The sun doth stand
Beneath the mingling line of night and day.
Jones Very, Poems, p. 39.

=Syn. See I.

mingle† (ming'gl), n. [Early mod. E. also mengle; < mingle, v.] A mixture; a medley; a jumble.

Acervatim, adverb, on heapes, without ordre, in a mengle. Eliot, Dict., 1559. (Nares.)

Trumpeters . . .
Make mingle with our rattling tabourines.
Shak., A. and C., iv. 8. 37.

mingleable† (ming'gl-ą-bl), a. [< mingle + -able.] Capable of being mingled; miscible.

Merely by the fire, quicksilver may, in convenient vessels, be reduced . . . into a thin liquor like water, and mingleable with it. Boyle, Works, I. 529.

mingledly (ming'gld-li), adv. In a mixed manner; confusedly.

mingle-mangle (ming'gl-mang″gl), v. t. [A varied redupl. of mingle, v.] To confuse; jumble together.

How pitteous then mans best of wit is martyr'd,
In barbrous manner tatter'd, torne, and quarter'd,
So mingle-mangled, and so hack't and hewd.
J. Taylor, Works (1630). (Nares.)

mingle-mangle† (ming'gl-mang″gl), n. [A varied redupl. of mingle, n.] A confused mixture; a medley.

Made a mingle-mangle and a hotch-potch of it.
Latimer, Sermons, fol. 49 b. (Nares.)

Thou mayst conceipt what mingle-mangle
Among this people every where did iangle.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., Babylon.

mingle-mangler† (ming'gl-mang″glėr), n. One who mixes and confuses things; a blundering meddler.

There be leaveners still, and mingle-manglers, that have soured Christ's doctrine with the leaven of the Pharisees.
Latimer, 2d Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1550.

minglement (ming'gl-ment), n. [< mingle + -ment.] The act of mingling, or the state of being mixed.

mingler (ming'glėr), n. One who mingles or mixes.

Mingrelian (ming-grē'li-an), a. and n. [< Mingrelia (see def.) + -an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to Mingrelia, near the Black Sea, formerly a principality and now a part of Caucasia, Russia.

II. n. A native or an inhabitant of Mingrelia.

miniard†, a. See migniard.

miniardize†, n. and v. See migniardise.

miniate (min'i-āt), v. t.; pret. and pp. miniated, ppr. miniating. [< L. miniatus, pp. of miniare (> It. miniare = Sp. miniar), color with red lead, < minium, red lead: see minium.] To paint or tinge with or as with minium; rubricate.

All the capitals in the body of the text [of the "Gesta Romanorum"] are miniated with a pen.
T. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, iii.

miniate (min'i-āt), a. [< L. miniatus, pp. of miniare: see miniate, v.] Of the color of minium.

miniatous (min'i-ā-tus), a. [< miniate + -ous.] In entom., miniate.

miniature (min'i-ą-tūr or min'i-ṭūr), n. and a. [< F. miniature = Sp. Pg. miniatura, < It. miniatura, < miniare, < L. miniare, paint in minium: see miniate, v.] I. n. 1. A painting, generally a portrait, of very small dimensions, usually executed in water-colors, but sometimes in oil, on ivory, vellum, or paper of a thick and fine quality.

A bright salmon flesh-tint which she had originally hit upon while executing the miniature of a young officer.
Dickens, Nicholas Nickleby, x.

Hence—2. Anything represented on a greatly reduced scale.

The water, with twenty bubbles, not content to have the picture of their face in large, would in each of these bubbles set forth the miniature of them. Sir P. Sidney.

Tragedy is the miniature of human life; an epic poem is the draught at length. Dryden, Æneid, Ded.

3. A greatly reduced scale, style, or form.

We may reasonably presume it [Eden] to have been the earth in miniature. Ep. Horne, Works, IV. ii.

The revolution through which English literature has been passing, from the time of Cowley to that of Scott, may be seen in miniature within the compass of his [Dryden's] volumes. Macaulay, John Dryden.

4†. Red letter; lettering in red lead or vermilion.

If the names of other saints are distinguished with miniature, her's [the Virgin's] ought to shine in gold.
Hickes, Sermons, ii.

5†. Anything small or on a small scale.

There's no miniature
In her fair face, but is a copious theme
Which would, discoursed at large of, make a volume.
Massinger, Duke of Florence, v. 3.

II. a. On a small scale; much reduced from natural size.

Here shall the pencil bid its colours flow,
And make a miniature creation grow.
Gay, The Fan, i.

In this cave . . . nearly the whole of the ornamentation is made up of miniature rails, and repetitions of window fronts or façades.
J. Fergusson, Hist. Indian Arch., p. 116.

miniature (min'i-ą-tūr or min'i-ṭūr), v. t.; pret. and pp. miniatured, ppr. miniaturing. [< miniature, n.] To represent or depict on a small scale. [Rare.]

miniaturist (min'i-ą-tūr-ist or min'i-ṭūr-ist), n. [< F. miniaturiste = Sp. Pg. miniaturista; as miniature + -ist.] One who paints miniatures; an illuminator of manuscripts, or a painter of small pictures, especially portraits.

The famous miniaturist Jean Foucquet of Tours was named the king's [Louis XI.'s] enlumineur.
Encyc. Brit., XIV. 523.

mining (mī'ning), n. [Verbal n. of mine[2], v.] The business or work of a miner: also used attributively: as, a mining engineer; mining tools.—Hydraulic mining. See hydraulic.—Mining claim. (a) The claim of a discoverer, or of one who has taken possession of a mine, or unoccupied ground supposed to contain a precious metal or mineral, to the exclusive right to work it, or to a right of preëmption; hence, generally, a piece of land supposed to contain a precious metal. (b) The area of mining-ground held under federal or State law by one claimant or association by virtue of one location and entry. In consequence of the peculiar right to follow a vein of ore beyond the line of the boundary upon the surface, it may be more correctly, though still somewhat vaguely, defined as a tract of mineral land, the owner of which is entitled to the surface rights and all subjacent minerals, together with certain lateral rights of mining beyond the boundary, and subject to the similar lateral rights of adjoining owners. When two veins connect or cross, priority of title generally gives a preference. Coal-land claims may be entered for not exceeding 160 acres to each individual, or 320 acres to each association. As to placer-mining claims, see placer-claim, under placer. —Mining district, engineering, jurisprudence, partnership, etc. See district, etc.

All are but ministers of Love,
And feed his sacred flame. Coleridge, Love.

3. In politics: (a) One of the persons appointed by the sovereign or chief magistrate of a country as the responsible heads of the different departments of the government; a minister of state: as, the minister of foreign affairs, of the interior, of finance, of war, of justice, etc. These officers constitute the ministry or executive department of the government; at their head is the prime (first) minister, or premier, the immediate deputy or representative of the sovereign or chief magistrate; he and other ministers, selected by him, are called collectively, as his coördinate advisers in matters of policy, the cabinet. Minister is used in most European countries as the official title of all heads of departments, but in Great Britain only in a generic sense (as, a minister of the crown), the individual ministers being officially designated the secretary of state for foreign affairs, for war, for the colonies, etc., or by other titles, as chancellor of the exchequer (minister of finance). In the government of the United States the title minister is not used at all, and there is no ministry; the corresponding officers, differing from the preceding both in mode of appointment and degree of power and responsibility, are called secretaries (of state, of the interior, of the treasury, of war, of the navy, of agriculture), postmaster-general, and attorney-general. See cabinet, 4.

Very different training was necessary to form a great minister for foreign affairs. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xi.

(b) A diplomatic representative of a country abroad; a person accredited by the executive authority of one country to that of another as its agent for communication and the transaction of business between the two governments; specifically, the political representative of a state in another state, in contradistinction to an ambassador, who holds a nominally higher rank as in general the personal representative of the sovereign or chief of the state at the court of another sovereign. Until 1893 the United States sent and received only ministers in this specific sense, called in full either envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary or ministers resident. Since that date ambassadors have been sent to and have been received from the principal European powers.—4. Eccles., in the New Testament, a servant of God, God's word, Christ, or the church; an officer of the church; an attendant or assistant (Acts xiii. 5): translating διάκονος (whence deacon), but sometimes λειτουργός (liturge) or ὑπηρέτης (an assistant); hence, any member of the ministry. The word is used of civil authorities in Rom. xiii. 4–6. In the ancient church minister usually meant a deacon or one in minor orders, the Latin word minister being the equivalent of the Greek διάκονος. See ministry.

These Orders of Ministers in Christ's Church,—Bishops, Priests, and Deacons.
Book of Common Prayer, Pref. to Ordinal.

Mr. Williams, the teacher at Salem, was again convented, and all the ministers in the bay being desired to be present, he was charged with the said two letters.

When pain and anguish wring the brow,
A ministering angel thou! Scott, Marmion, vi. 30.

ministerium (min-is-tē′ri-um), n. [< L. ministerium, ministry: see ministry.] 1. In the Lutheran Church, a body of ordained ministers having the sole charge of examining, licensing, and ordaining candidates for the ministry, of conducting trials for clerical heresy, and of hearing all appeals from church councils for lay heresy. The word is also sometimes used in a more general sense, as synonymous with synod, which includes both ministers and lay delegates in one body. In such cases, however, the ministerium proper consists of the ordained ministers only.

2. A name sometimes given to the epistle corner of a Christian altar, because there the server or minister assists the priest celebrant in making preparation for offering the eucharistic sacrifice. Lee.

ministery†, n. An obsolete form of ministry.

ministracioun†, n. A Middle English form of ministration.

ministral† (min′is-tral), a. [< F. ministral, < ML. ministralis, servant: see minister, n.] Pertaining to a minister; ministerial. Johnson.

ministrant (min′is-trant), a. and n. [= Sp. Pg. ministrante, < L. ministran(t-)s, ppr. of ministrare, serve: see minister, v.] I. a. Ministering; performing service; exercising ministry of any kind.

And call swift flights of angels ministrant
Array'd in glory on my cup to attend.
Milton, P. R., ii. 385.

That gentle hermit, in my helpless woe,
By my sick couch was busy to and fro,
Like a strong spirit ministrant of good.
Shelley, Revolt of Islam, iv. 5.

II. n. One who ministers; a servant or dispenser.

Strange ministrant of undescribed sounds
That come a-swooning over hollow grounds.
Keats, Endymion, i.

ministration (min-is-trā′shon), n. [< ME. ministracioun, < OF. ministration = It. ministrazione, < L. ministratio(n-), service, < ministrare, pp. ministratus, serve: see minister, v.] 1. The act of ministering or serving; service.

As soon as the days of his ministration were accomplished. Luke i. 23.

2†. Administration; agency; intervention for aid or service.

Thanne comforte him with ministracioun of oure quinte essencie afore seid, and he schal be al hool, but if it be so that god wole algatis that he schal die.
Book of Quinte Essence (ed. Furnivall), p. 15.

To hang a man for sixpence, threepence, I know not what—to hang for a trifle, and pardon murder, is in the ministration of the law through the ill framing of it.
Cromwell, quoted in Macaulay, Hallam's Const. Hist.

3. A religious service or other function.

The solemn and splendid ministrations of the church were made more magnificent by the stately order of the processions, the display of gay and costly dresses, the gleaming of armor, and the waving of innumerable banners. C. E. Norton, Church-building in Middle Ages, p. 100.

ministrative (min′is-trā-tiv), a. [= It. ministrativo; as ministrat(ion) + -ive.] Affording service or aid; assisting.

ministrator† (min′is-trā-tor), n. [= OF. ministrateur = Pg. ministrador, < L. ministrator, an attendant, servant, < ministrare, attend, serve: see minister, v.] An administrator.

The law and the ministrators of it.
Roger North, Examen, p. 74. (Davies.)

ministratoriously† (min″is-trā-tō′ri-us-li), adv. [< ministratorious* (< L. ministratorius, of or pertaining to service, < ministrator, servant: see ministrator) + *-ly*2.] In the capacity of an administrator. [Rare.]

A man can but onely ministratoriously giue any temporall dominion or gift perpetual, as well to his own natural sonne, as to his sonne by imitation.
State Trials, 6 Rich. II., an. 1383 (John Wycliffe).

ministress (min′is-tres), n. [< OF. ministresse, < L. ministrix, equiv. to ministra, a servant, fem. of minister: see minister.] 1. A female minister, in any sense.

Thus was beauty sent from Heaven,
The lovely ministress of truth and good.
Akenside, Pleasures of Imagination, i.

2†. A mistress.

The olde foxes cruell and severe mynistresse
Will learne the enterer never to come forth.
Benvenuto, Passengers' Dialogues. (Nares.)

ministry (min′is-tri), n.; pl. ministries (-triz). [Formerly also ministery; = F. ministère = Sp. Pg. It. ministerio, < L. ministerium, the office or function of an attendant or servant, attendance, service, office, occupation, employment, a suite of attendants, etc., < minister, an attendant, servant, minister: see minister, n. Cf. ministerium, and *mister*2, *mystery*2, ult. < L. ministerium.] 1. The act of ministering; the rendering of service; ministration.

It was a worthy edifying sight . . .
To see kind hands attending day and night,
With tender ministry, from place to place.
Thomson, Castle of Indolence, ii. 75.

2. The state of ministering or serving; agency; instrumentality.

The natural world he made after a miraculous manner; but directs the affairs of it ever since by . . . the ordinary ministry of second causes. Bp. Atterbury.

Think not that he, . . . who filled the chambers of the sky
With the ever-flowing air, hath need to use
The ministries thou speakest of.
Bryant, Tale of Cloudland.

3. The office or function of a minister, civil or ecclesiastical; the state of being a minister, in any sense; the exercise of a ministerial office: as, to discharge one's ministry faithfully; to enter the ministry of the gospel; to be appointed to the ministry of war.

Every one that came to do the service of the ministry . . . in the tabernacle of the congregation. Num. iv. 47.

Do you think in your heart that you are truly called . . . to the Order and Ministry of Priesthood?
Book of Common Prayer, Ordering of Priests.

Their ministry perform'd, and race well run, . . .
They die. Milton, P. L., xii. 505.

4. The general or a particular body of ministers of religion; the ministerial or clerical class; the clergy or priesthood. In episcopal churches the ministry consists of bishops, priests, and deacons, and of subdeacons and the minor orders, when such exist, in addition to these.

5. The body of ministers of state in a country; the heads of departments collectively; the executive administration: as, to form a ministry; the policy of the British ministry; the French ministry has resigned. In the United States the corresponding body is called the cabinet.

The word Ministry was not then in use, but Counsellors or Courtiers. For the King himself [Charles II.] then took so much upon him that the ministers had not that aggregate title. Roger North, Examen, p. 69. (Davies.)

The first English ministry was gradually formed; nor is it possible to say quite precisely when it began to exist.
Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xxiv.

6. A ministerial department of government; the organization of functionaries administering a branch of public affairs; a minister and his subordinates collectively: as, the ministry of war or of justice.

Immediately below these three institutions stand the ministries, ten in number. D. M. Wallace, Russia, p. 198.

ministryship (min′is-tri-ship), n. [< ministry + -ship.] The office of a minister; ministry. Swift. [Rare.]

minium (min′i-um), n. [Formerly also minion, < OF. minion, F. minium = Sp. Pg. It. minio; < L. minium, native cinnabar, red lead: said to be a Spanish (Hispanic) word. Hence miniate, miniature.] Red oxid of lead, Pb_3O_4, produced by maintaining the protoxid (litharge) at a low red heat for some time in presence of air. It is a bright-orange granular powder, used as a pigment and in the manufacture of flint-glass. See vermilion. — Iron minium, a name given to a large number of substances used as paints, especially for ironwork and sea-going vessels. — Oxidized minium, a dried composition consisting of lead nitrate, lead peroxid, and undecomposed minium, obtained by drying a magma of minium and nitric acid.

miniver (min′i-vėr), n. [Formerly also minever, meniver, dial. minifer; < ME. meniver, menyver, < OF. menu ver, menu veir, menu vair, a grayish fur, miniver, also "the beast that bears it" (Cotgrave), lit. little vair: menu, little; vair, a kind of fur: see *minute*1 and vair.] 1. A mixed or spotted fur once commonly used for lining or trimming garments. According to Cotgrave, it was "the fur of ermins mixed or spotted with the fur of the weesel called gris"; but according to Planché, miniver was the white part only of the patchwork designs of different furs in use at certain epochs during the middle ages, as is seen in the heraldic furs, which retain the designs most commonly used at that time.

A burnet cote heng therwith alle, Furred with no menyvere.
Rom. of the Rose, l. 227.

Me lists not tell of ouches rare,
Of marbles green, and braided hair,
And kirtles furred with miniver.
Scott, L. of L. M., vi. 4.

2. In her., a fur like vair, with the peculiarity that the escutcheon-miniver contains six or more horizontal rows of spots. — 3. The Siberian squirrel, which has fine white fur; also, the fur itself.

minivet (min′i-vet), n. One of various campophagine birds of the genus Pericrocotus.

mink (mingk), n. [Formerly also minx (appar. an error); appar. < Sw. mänk, a mink (Putorius lutreola), transferred from the European mink to the American species.] 1. An American digitigrade carnivorous quadruped of the family Mustelidæ, Putorius (Lutreola) vison, of semi-aquatic habits. The mink belongs to the same genus as the stoats and weasels, but to a different subgenus, its form being modified in adaptation to its aquatic habits, in which respect it approaches the otters. It was once called lesser otter. It is larger and stouter than any stoat, with shorter ears, uniformly bushy tail, and half-webbed feet; the color is rich dark chestnut-brown, blackening on the back and tail; the chin, and usually some irregular patches on the throat, breast, or belly, are white. It is 15 to 18 inches long, the tail 6 or 8 inches more. It is found everywhere in North America in suitable places; its fur is valuable, and the animal is systematically trapped, especially in British America. Like its relatives, the mink exhales a strong musky odor, and is destructive to poultry. There are several well-marked geographical races or subspecies, and the Florida mink is a distinct species, P. lutensis. The corresponding animal in Europe is P. lutreola, commonly called norz or nörz, and by its Swedish name mänk (sometimes mank)—the designation European mink being a late book-name. It is much like the American mink, but its average size is smaller, and it usually has the upper lip as well as the chin white, and presents certain dental peculiarities. The Siberian mink, lately so called, is the kulon, P. sibiricus, a quite different species. Also called vison.

2. Same as kingfish (a).

minkery (ming′kėr-i), n.; pl. minkeries (-iz). [< mink + -ery.] An establishment where minks are bred and trained for ratting, like the ferret.

Mr. Resseque's minkery consisted of twelve stalls, each twelve feet square, of stale soil, and surrounded with a fence, and some special precautions to prevent the escape of the animals.

Coues, Fur-Bearing Animals (ed. 1877), p. 182.

minnet, n. and v. See min[3].

minne-drinking (min′e-dring′king), n. [< G. minne, love, + E. drinking, verbal n. of drink, v.] Originally, a heathen practice among the Teutonic nations at grand sacrifices and banquets, in honor of the gods or in memory of the absent or deceased. This custom was sanctioned by the church, the saints being substituted for the gods, and was especially consecrated to St. John the Evangelist and to St. Gertrude. Traces of it are still found in certain localities of Germany.

Minne-drinking, even as a religious rite, apparently exists to this day in some parts of Germany. At Otbergen, a village of Hildesheim, on Dec. 27 every year a chalice of wine is hallowed by the priest, and handed to the congregation in the church to drink as Johannis segen (blessing). Grimm, Teut. Mythol. (trans.), I. 62.

minnekin†, n. An obsolete form of minikin.

minnelied (min′e-lēt), n. [G., < minne, love, + lied, song.] A love-song.

The first lyrical writer of Holland was John I., duke of Brabant, who practised the minnelied with success.

Encyc. Brit., XII. 90.

minnepoetry (min′e-po″et-ri), n. The poetry of the minnesingers.

The classical representative of Minnepoetry, Walther von der Vogelweide. Amer. Jour. Philol., VIII. 454.

minnesinger (min′e-sing-ėr), n. [G., < minne, love, + singer, a singer.] One of a class of German lyric poets and singers of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, so called because love was the chief theme of their poems. They were chiefly or exclusively men of noble descent—knights, nobles, princes, and even emperors. They sang their pieces to their own accompaniment on the viol, and often engaged in poetical contests for the gratification of princes and ladies of the court. Among the chief seats of the minnesingers were Swabia and Austria, and the leading dialect used was the Swabian. The minnesingers were succeeded by the mastersingers. See mastersinger.

Minnesotan (min-e-sō′tan), n. [< Minnesota (see def.) + -an.] A native or an inhabitant of Minnesota, a northwestern State of the United States, north of Iowa.

minnet (min′et), n. See minute[2].

minnie[1] (min′i), n. A dialectal form of minnow.

minnie[2] (min′i), n. [Dim. of min[4].] A childish word for mother. [Scotch.]

Bad luck on the penny that tempted my minnie
To sell her poor Jenny for siller an' lan'!

Burns, What Can a Young Lassie.

minnikin†, minniken†, n. and a. Obsolete forms of minikin.

minning (min′ing), n. [< ME. minnyng; verbal n. of min[3].] Reminding.

minning-day† (min′ing-dā), n. [ME. minnyng-day.] The anniversary of a death, on which the deceased was had in special remembrance, and special offices were said for his soul. See a year's mind, under mind[1].

All the day and night after the Buriall they vse to have excessive ringinge for ye dead, as also at the twel-monthes day after, which they call a minninge-day.

Chetham Misc., V. xv. (N. and Q., 7th ser., III. 448.)

minnis (min′is), n. [Cf. minnow.] The stickleback. [Local, Eng.]

minnow (min′ō), n. [Formerly also minow, minoe, menow, etc.; also dial. minny, minnie (cf. equiv. dial. minim, minnan, mennam, mennom, appar. conformed to L. minimus, least: see minim); < ME. menow, a minnow, appar. < AS. mine*, myne (pl. mynas), a minnow (glossed by ML. mena); possibly from the root of min[2], less, with ME. term. -ow due to confusion with some other word, perhaps OF. menu, small; cf. ME. menuse, small fish, < OF. menuise (ML. menusia), small fish collectively, < L. minutus, small: see menuse[2].] 1. The smallest of the British cyprinoid fishes, Phoxinus phoxinus. Artificial minnows are used by anglers for trolling, spinning, or casting, and are made of metal, glass, and rubber, gilded, silvered, or painted attractively.

Common English Minnow (Phoxinus phoxinus).

Hear you this Triton of the minnows?

Shak., Cor., iii. 1. 89.

2. In the United States, one of many different fishes of small size. (a) Any cyprinoid of the genus Phoxinus, of which there are several species, from 1½ to 3 inches long, in the Mississippi basin and westward, as P. neogæus, P. flammeus, P. phlegethontis. This is the correct use of minnow, though in popular speech it extends to various other little cyprinoids, also loosely called roach, dace, shiner, etc. Among these may be mentioned the red minnows of the genus Chrosomus, as C. erythrogaster, one of the prettiest of all, 2 or 3 inches long; the silvery minnow, Hybognathus nuchalis, and others of this genus; the black-headed minnow or fathead, Pimephales promelas; the blunt-nosed minnow, Pimephales notatus; the Texan hardmouth minnow, Cochlognathus ornatus; the bull-headed and straw-colored minnows, Notropis taurocephalus and Cliola straminea; the spotted-tail, N. stigmaturus, and more than 150 other kinds of Notropis; various species of the genera Rhinichthys, Hybopsis, Apocope, Couesius, etc. These abound in fresh waters of the United States, and minnow is the usual name of all those which have not more particular designations. (b) One of numerous small cyprinodont fishes, otherwise known as killifishes and mummychogs, and more fully called top-minnows, as Zygonectes notatus and many others of this genus. The most abundant of these is Fundulus heteroclitus, found in brackish waters from Maine to Mexico, and sometimes specified as salt-water minnow. F. diaphanus is the spring minnow. (c) Any American member of the family Umbridæ and genus Umbra, as U. limi, more fully called mud-minnow, 4 inches long, found from New England to Minnesota and South Carolina, often in mere mud-holes which would hardly be expected to lodge any fish. It is closely related to U. crameri of Austria. (d) One of various small viviparous perches or embiotocoid fishes of California, chiefly of salt water, as the sparada, Cymatogaster aggregatus. (e) One of several small suckers or catostomoid fishes: a loose use of the name.

minnow-harness (min′ō-här″nes), n. An artificial bait used for trolling to which a minnow can be attached.

minny (min′i), n. A provincial form of minnow.

mino[1] (mē′nō), n. [Jap.] A thatch-like raincoat or cape made of hempen fibers, long grass, rushes, or the like laid close together, and bound in place at the top by plaiting or by some similar means: used in Japan by coolies, farm-laborers, etc.

mino[2] (mī′nō), n. A variant of mina[2].

minor (mī′nor), a. and n. [< ME. minour*, menour, < OF. menor, F. mineur = Sp. Pg. menor = It. minore, < L. minor (neut. minus), less, compar. (with superl. minimus, least: see minim, minimum, etc.) associated with adj. parvus, small; = AS. min = OS. minniro, etc., less: see min[2].] I. a. 1. Smaller (than the other); less; lesser: applied definitively to one of two units or parts, and opposed to major or greater: as, the minor axis of an ellipse; the minor premise of a syllogism; the minor part of an estate.

They altered this custom from cases of high concernment to the most trivial debates, the minor part ordinarily entering their protest. Clarendon, Great Rebellion.

2. Smaller than others; of inferior rank or degree; lower; hence, small; inconsiderable; not capital, serious, or weighty: as, the minor officers of government; a minor canon; the minor points of an argument; minor faults or considerations.

Now frere menour, now jacobyn.
Rom. of the Rose, l. 6338.

Neither in the name of multitude do I only include the base and minor sort of people.
Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, ii. 1.

Inconsistency with respect to questions of minor importance is not likely to be regarded as dishonourable.
Macaulay, Sir W. Temple.

3. Under age. [Rare.]

At which time . . . the king was minor.
Bacon, Hist. Hen. VII., p. 145.

4. In music: (a) Of intervals, less; shorter; smaller (as compared with major intervals). The word is more often applied to seconds, thirds, sixths, sevenths, ninths, etc., designating an interval equal to the corresponding major interval less one half-step. It has also been applied of late to fourths, fifths, and eighths, and is then equivalent to the older term diminished. Finally, it is used to designate the smaller of two intervals that differ by a minute quantity, as a minor tone (10:9), which is a comma less than a major tone: opposed to major. See interval, 5. (b) Of tonalities and scales, characterized by a minor third and also usually by a minor sixth, and often a minor seventh: opposed to major. See key, tonality, scale. (c) Of triads and chords generally, characterized by a minor third between the lowest and the next to the lowest tones: opposed to major. See triad, and chord, 4. (d) Of modes, characterized by the use of a minor tonality and of minor cadences: as, the piece is written throughout in the minor mode: opposed to major. See major, 4. —Bob minor. See bob[1], 7.—Minor abstraction. See abstraction.—Minor axis. Same as conjugate axis (which see, under axis[1]).—Minor canon, determinant, excommunication. See the nouns.—Minor orders (eccles.). See order.—Minor premise, that premise which contains the minor term. This is the usual definition, but there has been much dispute on the subject. See major, 5. —Minor prophets, a name given collectively to twelve prophetic Old Testament books, from Hosea to Malachi, inclusive, and their authors. See prophet.—Minor term, in logic, the subject of the conclusion of a categorical syllogism.

II. n. 1. A person of either sex who is under age; one who is of less than the legal age for the performance of certain acts; one under the authority of parents or guardians, because of not having reached the age at which the law permits one to make contracts and manage one's own property; an infant in the legal sense. In Scots law, minor, when used in contradistinction to pupil signifies a person above the age of pupilarity (twelve in females and fourteen in males) and under that of majority, which in both sexes is twenty-one years. The technical term in English and United States law for one under the age of legal capacity (twenty-one years) is infant, but minor is used in the same sense in general literature. Compare age, n., 3.

Long as the year's dull circle seems to run,
When the brisk minor pants for twenty-one.
Pope, Imit. of Horace, I. i. 38.

King Henry, although old enough at seven to be crowned, was still a minor.
Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 173.

2. In logic, the minor term, or the minor premise. See I.—3. In music, the minor mode or a minor tonality or minor chord taken absolutely.

In all your music our pathetic minor
Your ears shall cross.
Mrs. Browning, Drama of Exile.

4. [cap.] A Franciscan friar; a Minorite: so called from a name of the Franciscan order, Fratres Minores, or Lesser Brethren. Also called Friar Minor.—Minor of a determinant. See determinant.—Rosy minor a species of moth. See Miana.

minorate† (mī′nō-rāt), v. t. [< LL. minoratus, pp. of minorare (> It. minorare = Sp. Pg. minorar, make less), diminish, < L. minor, less: see minor.] To diminish.

Which it [sense] doth not only by the advantageous assistance of a tube, but by less industrious experiments, showing in what degrees distance minorates the object.
Glanville, Vanity of Dogmatizing, viii.

minoration (mī-nō-rā′shọn), n. [= F. minoration = Sp. minoración = Pg. minoração = It. minorazione, < LL. minoratio(n-), diminution, < minorare, diminish: see minorate.] 1†. A lessening; diminution.

We now do hope the mercies of God will consider our degenerated integrity unto some minoration of our offences. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., I. 2.

2. In med., mild purgation by laxatives.

minorative (mī′nō-rā-tiv), a. and n. [= F. minoratif, minorative, = Sp. Pg. minorativo, lessening, = It. minorativo, minorative; as minorat(ion) + -ive.] I. a. Mildly laxative: applied to certain medicines.

II. n. A mildly laxative medicine.

For a minorative or gentle potion he took four hundred pound weight of colophoniac scammony. Urquhart, tr. of Rabelais, ii. 33. (Davies.) minoress (mī′nọr-es), n. [< minor + -ess.] 1. A female under age.—2†. A nun under the rule of St. Clare. (Tyrwhitt.) [This word is found in the early printed editions of the "Romaunt of the Rose," l. 149. Moveresse appears in modern editions taken from the original French (Rom. of the Rose, l. 141).]

Minorite (mī′nọr-īt), n. and a. [< minor + -ite[2].] I. n. A Franciscan friar; a Minor. See minor, n., 4.

Some minorite among the clergy. Bp. Hacket, Abp. Williams, ii. 202. (Davies.)

II. a. Belonging to the Franciscans.

Few movements within the bosom of the Church were more pregnant with auspicious augury for its reformation than the rise of the Minorite orders. J. Owen, Evenings with Skeptics, II. 381.

minority (mi- or mī-nor′i-ti), n.; pl. minorities (-tiz). [= F. minorité = Pr. menoretat = Sp. minoridad = Pg. minoridade = It. minorità, < ML. minorita(t-)s, a being less, minority, < L. minor, less: see minor.] 1†. The state of being minor or smaller.

From this narrow time of gestation [may] ensue a minority or smallness in the exclusion. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii. 6.

2. The minor part in number; the smaller of two aggregates into which a whole is divided numerically; a number less than half: opposed to majority.

That minority of the Scottish nation by the aid of which the government had hitherto held the majority down. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vi.

Remember, sir, that everything great and excellent is in minorities. Emerson, Address to Kossuth.

Specifically—3. The smaller of two related aggregates of persons; the minor division of any whole number of persons: as, the rights of the minority; government by minorities.

To give the minority a negative upon the majority, which is always the case where more than a majority is requisite to a decision, is . . . to subject the sense of the greater number to that of the lesser. A. Hamilton, The Federalist, No. 22.

4. The state of being a minor or not come of age, and therefore legally incapacitated for the performance of certain acts; the period or interval before one is of full age, generally the period from birth until twenty-one years of age (see age, 3); in Scots law, the interval between pupilarity and majority. See minor, n., 1.

What mean all those hard restraints and shackles put upon us in our minority. South, Works, IV. v.

King Edmund dying, his brother Edred in the Minority of his Nephews was crowned at Kingston upon Thames. Baker, Chronicles, p. 11.

Minority representation. See proportional representation, under representation.

minorship (mī′nọr-ship), n. [< minor + -ship.] The state of being a minor.

Minotaur (min′ō-târ), n. [< ME. Minotaur, < OF. Minotaur, F. Minotaure = Sp. Pg. It. Minotauro, < L. Minotaurus, < Gr. Μινώταυρος, the Minotaur, appar. < Μίνως, Minos, a legendary king and lawgiver of Crete, + ταῦρος, a bull. But this is perhaps a popular etym. of some name not understood.] In Gr. myth., a monster represented as having a human body and the head of a bull, who was the offspring of Pasiphaë, wife of Minos, and a bull sent by Poseidon. He was confined in the Cretan labyrinth and fed with human flesh, devoured the seven youths and seven maidens whom Minos compelled the Athenians to send him periodically as tribute, and was killed by the hero Theseus, a member of the last company so sent, who escaped from the labyrinth by the aid of Ariadne, daughter of Minos. Hence, in modern literature, the name is used to characterize any devouring or destroying agency of which the action is in some way comparable to that attributed to the Cretan monster.

And by his [Theseus's] baner born is his penoun
Of gold ful riche, in which ther was i-bete
The Minotaur which that he slough in Crete.
Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 122.

Thou may'st not wander in that labyrinth:
There Minotaurs and ugly treasons lurk.
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., v. 3. 189.

minourt, n. A Middle English form of miner.

minsitivet, a. [Appar. irreg. < minse, mince, + -itive.] Mincing; affected; servile.

Never say, your lordship, nor your honour; but you, and you, my lord, and my lady: the other they count too simple and minsitive. B. Jonson, Poetaster, iv. 1.

minster (min′stėr), n. [< ME. minster, mynster, munster, menstre, etc., < AS. mynster = D. munster = MLG. munster = OHG. munusturi, munistri, monastri, MHG. G. münster = OF. mustier, moustier, F. moûtier, < LL. monasterium, < Gr. μοναστήριον, a monastery: see monastery.] Originally, a monastery; afterward, the church of a monastery; also, from the fact that many such churches, especially in Great Britain, became cathedrals, a cathedral church which had such an origin: as, York minster; hence, any cathedral: as, the minster of Strasburg. It is found also in the names of several places which owe their origin to a monastery: as, West*minster*, Leo*minster*.

The same nyght the kynge comaunded the children to go wake in the cheiff mynster till on the morowe be-fore messe, that no lenger he wolde a-bide. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 374.

The Ages one great minster seem,
That throbs with praise and prayer.
Lowell, Godminster Chimes.

minstracie†, n. An old form of minstrelsy.

minstrel (min′strel), n. [< ME. minstrel, mynstrelle, minstral, mynstral, menstral, munstral, ministral, menestral, < OF. menestral, menestrel, menesterel, F. ménestrel = Pr. menestral = Sp. menestral, menestril, ministril = Pg. ministrel, menestrel, menistrel = It. ministrello, minestrello, < ML. ministralis (also, after Rom., ministrellus), a servant, retainer, jester, singer, player, < L. minister, a servant, attendant: see minister. Cf. ML. ministerialis in same sense, < ministerium, service: see ministerial.] 1. A musician, especially one who sings or recites to the accompaniment of instruments. Specifically, in the middle ages, the minstrels were a class who devoted themselves to the amusement of the great in castle or camp by singing ballads or songs of love and war, sometimes of their own composition, with accompaniment on the harp, lute, or other instrument, together with suitable mimicry and action, and also by story-telling, etc. The intermediate class of professional musicians from which the later minstrels sprang appeared in France as early as the eighth century, and was by the Norman conquest introduced into England, where it was assimilated with the Anglo-Saxon gleemen. Everywhere the social importance of the minstrels slowly degenerated, until in the fifteenth century they had formed themselves generally into gilds of itinerant popular musicians and mountebanks. In England they fell so low in esteem that in 1597 they were classed by a statute with rogues, vagabonds, and sturdy beggars; but in France their gilds were maintained until the revolution. See gleeman, troubadour, trouvère, and jongleur.

Minstrel.—From the Maison des Musiciens, Rheims, France; 13th century.

Whan the servise was ffynisshed, the kynge Arthur and the Barouns returned in to the paleys, where-as was grete plente of mynstralles, and iogelours, and other. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 454.

Ye'll gi'e the third to the minstrel
That plays before the king.
Young Akin (Child's Ballads, I. 184).

Wake ye from your sleep of death,
Minstrels and bards of other days!
Scott, Bard's Incantation.

But while the minstrel proper accompanied his lord to the field and shared with him the danger and the honour of his warlike exploits, the connection between him and the humbler kind of entertainer [the jongleur], who was still the servant of the multitude rather than of a particular lord, cannot have been wholly forgotten. A. W. Ward, Eng. Dram. Lit., I. 13.

Hence—2. Any poet or musician. [Poetical.]—3. Originally, one of a class of singers of negro melodies and delineators of life on the Southern plantations which originated in the United States about 1830: called negro minstrels, although they are usually white men whose faces and hands are blackened with burnt cork. The characteristic feature of such a troupe or band is the middle-man or interlocutor, who leads the talk and gives the cues, and the two end-men, who usually perform on the tambourine and the bones, and between whom the indispensable conundrums and jokes are exchanged. As now constituted, a negro-minstrel troupe retains but little of its original character except the black faces and the old jokes.

minstrel-squire (min′strel-skwīr), n. A minstrel who was attached to one particular person.

minstrelsy (min′strel-si), n. [< ME. minstralcie, mynstralcye, menstralcy, minstracie, menstracye, etc., < OF. menestralsie, minstrelsy, < menestral, minstrel: see minstrel.] 1. The art or occupation of minstrels; singing and playing in the manner of a minstrel; lyrical song and music.

Holliche thanne with his host hizede to here tentes
With merthe of alle menstracye, and made hem attese.
William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 1295.

When every room
Hath blaz'd with lights and bray'd with minstrelsy.
Shak., T. of A., ii. 2. 170.

Originally . . . the profession of the joculator included all the arts attributed to the minstrels; and accordingly his performance was called his minstrelsy in the reign of Edward II., and even after he had obtained the appellation of a tregetour. Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 287.

2. An assemblage or company of minstrels; a body of singers and players.

So many maner minstracie at that mariage were.
William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 5010.

The bride hath paced into the hall—
Red as a rose is she!
Nodding their heads before her goes
The merry minstrelsy.
Coleridge, Ancient Mariner, i.

3†. A collection of instruments used by minstrels.

For sorwe of which he brak his minstralcie,
Bothe harpe and lute, and giterne and sautrie.
Chaucer, Manciple's Tale, l. 163.

Lutte and rybybe, bothe gangande,
And all manere of mynstralsye.
Thomas of Erseldoune (Child's Ballads, I. 106).

4. A collection or body of lyrical songs and ballad poetry, such as were sung by minstrels: as, Scott's "Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border."

The body of traditional minstrelsy which commemorated the heroic deeds performed in these wars. Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., Int.

★mint[1] (mint), n. [< ME. mint, mynt, menet, munet, < AS. mynet, mynit, mynyt (not mynt*), a coin, coin, coinage, money (cf. mynet-smiththe, a place for coinage, a mint), = OFries. menote, mente, monte, munte = D. munt = MLG. LG. munte, monte = OHG. muniza, muniz, MHG. G. münze, a place for coining money, a coin, = Icel. mynt, mint, = Sw. mynt, a place for coining money, a coin, money, = Dan. mynt, a coin, money, mönt, a place for coining money, = OF. moneie, monoie, F. monnaie (> E. money) = Pr. Cf. money, a doublet of mint[1].] 1†. A coin; coin; coined money; money.

Thees if me spende, or mynt for them receyve,
The sonner wol they brymme ayeine and brynge Forth pigges moo. Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 99.

2. A place where money is coined by public authority. The coining of money is now considered a prerogative of government. In early times there were many mints in England, but now the only one in that country is the Royal Mint, Tower Hill, London. The United States Mint was established by act of April 2d, 1792, and located at Philadelphia. Other mints were afterward established at San Francisco, New Orleans, Denver, Carson City, Charlotte, N. C., and Dahlonega, Ga. (but the last three have been suspended, the first in 1893 and the last two in 1861). The United States Mint is a bureau of the Treasury Department.

And so (vpon the matter) to set the mint on work, and to giue way to new coines of siluer, which should bee then minted. Bacon, Hist. Hen. VII., p. 215.

In one higher roome of this Mint . . . I saw fourteene marvailous strong chests, . . . in which is kept nothing but money. Coryat, Crudities, I. 242.

3. Figuratively, a source of fabrication or invention.

And haue a mint in their pragmaticall heads of such supersubtle inuentions. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 393.

The busy mint
Of our laborious thoughts is ever going,
And coining new desires. Quarles, Emblems, ii. 2.

4. A quantity such as a mint turns out; a great supply or store: as, a mint of money.

And so tasselled and so ruffled with a mint of bravery. R. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, p. 129.

5. [cap.] A place of privilege or asylum in Southwark, London, near the Queen's Prison, where persons sheltered themselves from justice, under the pretext that this place was an ancient palace of the crown. (Rapalje and Lawrence.) The privilege is now abolished.—

Master of the mint, an officer in the English administration who presided over the mint. The office has been abolished, the mint being now under the direct control of the chancellor of the exchequer.—Warden of the mint, formerly, an officer of the English mint next in rank to the master. He collected the seigniorage, and superintended the manufacture of the coins.

mint[1] (mint), v. t. [< ME. minten, mynten, < AS. mynetian (= OS. munitōn = OFries. montia, muntia = D. MLG. munten = OHG. munizon, MHG. G. münzen = Sw. mynta = Dan. mynte), coin, < mynet, a coin: see mint[1], n.] 1. To coin; stamp and convert into money.

Siluer and gold coyne, then mynted of purpose, was cast among the people in great quantitie.
Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 467.

A sovereign prince calls in the good old money . . . to be new marked and minted. Lamb, Elia, p. 218.

2. To invent; forge; fabricate.

Look into the titles whereby they hold those new portions of the crown, and you will find them of such natures as may be easily minted. Bacon, War with Spain.

And such mint [minted] phrase, as 'tis the worst of canting, By how much it affects the sense it has not.
B. Jonson, Staple of News, iv. 1.

A full catalogue of exotic words, such as are daily minted by our Logodædali. Evelyn, To Sir Peter Wyche.

★mint[2] (mint), n. [< ME. minte, mynte, mente, < AS. minte = MD. D. munt = LG. mynte, minte = OHG. minza, munza, MHG. G. minze, münze = Icel. minta = Sw. mynta = Dan. mynte (= F. menthe, > Sp. It. menta), < L. menta, mentha, < Gr. μίνθα, μίνθη, mint.] 1. A plant of the genus Mentha. The most familiar species are the peppermint, M. piperita, and the spearmint (garden-mint, mackerel-mint), M. spicata, well known as medicines and condiments. The bergamot-mint, affording a perfumers' oil, is M. citrata; the crisped or curled mint is M. crispa; the fish mint is M. aquatica. The water-mint (or brook-mint) of older usage was M. sylvestris, now called horsemint. The corn-mint is M. arvensis. The pennyroyal-mint or pennyroyal is M. Pulegium—that is, flea-mint. The whorled mint is M. sativa; the wild mint of the United States, M. Canadensis. See cut under Mentha.

The mynte is in this moone ysowe.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 192.

Then rubb'd it o'er with newly gather'd mint,
A wholesome herb, that breath'd a grateful scent.
Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., viii. 88.

2. One of several other, mostly labiate, plants with mint-like properties. Compare catmint.—Green mint, a cordial flavored with peppermint.—Mint julep. See julep.

mint[3] (mint), v. i. [< ME. minten, menten, mynten, < AS. myntan, gemyntan, mean, intend, purpose, think, suppose, < munan (pres. man), think, consider, remember: see mine[3], mind[1].] 1. To aim; purpose; endeavor. [Old Eng. and Scotch.]

Wyth grete wrath he can mynte,
But he fayled of hys dynte.
MS. Cantab. Ff. ii. 38, f. 189. (Halliwell.)

They that mint at a gown of gold will always get a sleeve of it. Scott, Monastery, xvii.

★2. To insinuate; hint. [Scotch.]

mintage (min'tāj), n. [< mint[1] + -age. Cf. F. monnayage = It. monetaggio, < ML. monetagium, < L. moneta, money: see money, monetage.] 1. The act of coining or fabricating; formation; production by or as if by minting.

Few literary theories of modern mintage have more to recommend them. Maine, Early Law and Custom, p. 15.

The chief place of mintage in these regions was the great trading and colonizing city of Miletus.
B. V. Head, Historia Numorum, Int., p. xlvi.

2. That which is minted, or formed by or as if by coining or stamping; hence, a fabrication or manufacture; a coinage.

Stamped in clay, a heavenly mintage. Sterling.

Of one of his mintages [coined words] Mr. Reade is, apparently, not a little proud. F. Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 26.

3. The charge for or cost of minting; the duty or allowance for coinage; seigniorage on coins.

Some small savings would accrue from the less amount of mintage required. Jevons, Money, p. 168.

mint-bush (mint'bůsh), n. A plant of the Australian genus Prostanthera.

mint-drop (mint'drop), n. 1. A sugar-plum flavored with peppermint.—2. A coin. [Slang, U. S.]

minter (min'tėr), n. [< ME. minter, < AS. mynetere, one who coins, one who deals in money, a money-changer, = OS. muniteri, a money-changer, = OFries. menotere, mentere, mentre, munter = D. munter, muntster = MLG. munter, = OHG. munizari, MHG. munzer, G. münzer, a money-changer, = F. monnayeur = It. monetiere, < LL. monetarius, a master of the mint, a coiner, < L. moneta, mint, money, coin: see mint[1] and money. Cf. moneyer and monetary.] A coiner; one who mints or stamps coin; hence, one who fabricates or makes as if by coining.

Since priests have been minters, money hath been worse than it was before. Latimer, Sermon of the Plough.

The minter must adde of other weight . . . if the siluer be so pure. Camden, Remains, p. 204.

God stamped his image upon us, and so God is . . . our minter, our statuary. Donne, Sermons, vii.

mintjac (mint'jak), n. Same as muntjac.

The kidang or mintjac (Cervulus muntjac) and the rusa (Rusa hippelaphus) are the chief representatives of the deer kind; the former is a delicate little creature occurring singly or in pairs both in the mountains and in the coast districts.
Encyc. Brit., XIII. 602.

mint-julep (mint'jö'lep), n. See julep.

They were great roysters, much given to revel on hoecake and bacon, mint-julep and apple-toddy.
Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 247.

mintman† (mint'man), n. A coiner; one skilled in coining or in coins.

Let such as are to informe councils out of their particular professions (as lawyers, sea-men, mint-men, and the like) be first heard before committees.
Bacon, Of Counsel (ed. 1887).

mint-mark (mint'märk), n. A private mark put upon coins by the mint authorities for purposes of identification. Sometimes this mark indicates the place of mintage, as "S" on certain sovereigns of Queen Victoria, denoting that the pieces were coined at Sydney in Australia; sometimes it relates to the mint-master or other official.

mint-master (mint'mäs″tėr), n. [= D. muntmeester = MHG. G. münzmeister = Sw. myntmästare = Dan. myntmester; as mint[1] + master.] 1. The master or superintendent of a mint.

That which is coined, as mintmasters confessed, is allayed with about a twelfth part of copper. Boyle.

2. One who invents or fabricates.

That the Iewes were forward Mint-Masters in this new-coyned Religion of Mahomet. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 263.

Setting aside the odde coinage of your phrase, which no mintmaister of language would allow for sterling.
Milton, On Def. of Humb. Remonst.

mint-sauce (mint'sâs'), n. In cookery, mint chopped and mixed with vinegar and sugar, used especially as a sauce for roast lamb.

mint-stick (mint'stik), n. Sticks of candy flavored with peppermint. [Local, U. S.]

The soldiers hunger for dates, figs, mint-stick, . . . that the sutler keeps for sale.
New York Tribune, June 13, 1862. (Bartlett.) mint-tree (mint'trē), n. A plant of the Australian genus Prostanthera, especially P. lasianthos.

mint-warden (mint'wâr″dn), n. See warden of the mint, under mint.

mint-while†, n. Same as minute-while.

minuend (min'ū-end), n. [< L. minuendus, to be diminished, gerundive of minuere, lessen: see minute[1].] In arith., the number from which another number is to be deducted in the process of subtraction.

minuet (min'ū-et), n. [= Sp. minuete, minué = Pg. minuete = It. minuetto, < F. menuet, a dance so called from the small steps taken in it, < menuet, smallish, little, pretty, thin (Cotgrave), dim. of menu, small, < L. minutus, small: see minute[1].] 1. A slow and graceful dance, invented, probably in Poitou, France, about the middle of the seventeenth century. Throughout the eighteenth century it was the most popular of the more stately and ceremonious dances.—2. Music for such a dance, or in its rhythm, which is triple and slow. Minuets are frequently found in the old suite, and also in the later sonata and symphony. They properly consist of two contrasted sections of sixteen measures each, the second of which is generally called a trio, because originally written for but three instruments; but this regular form is often considerably modified. Beethoven was the first to replace the minuet in the sonata and the symphony by the scherzo, which resembled the minuet somewhat in rhythm, but was more sprightly and unrestricted in form and spirit.

minumi, n. An obsolete form of minim. Cotgrave.

minus (mī'nus), a. [< L. minus, neut. of minor, less: see minor.] 1. Less (by a certain amount): followed by a noun as an apparent object (a preposition, by, to be supplied): as, the net amount is so much minus the waste or tare; 25 minus 9 is 16. In algebra and arithmetic this sense is indicated by the sign −, called the minus sign or sign of subtraction: as, $a - b = x$, which is read "a minus b equals x"; $25 - 9 = 16$.

2. Less than nothing; belonging to the inverse or negative side, as of an account; lying in the direction from the origin of measurement opposite to ordinary quantities; below zero, or below the lowest point of positive or upward reckoning: as, a minus amount or sum (that is, an amount or sum representing loss or debt); a minus quantity in an equation (that is, one having the minus sign before it); the temperature was minus twenty degrees (written −20°, and read "twenty degrees below zero"). In some common mathematical phrases, minus seems to be used as an adverb modifying the numeral adjective. Thus astronomers speak of the year minus 584 of the Christian era, meaning 585 B. C.

3. Marking or yielding less than nothing or less than zero; negative in value or result: as, the minus sign (see def. 1).—4. Deprived or devoid of; not having; without, as something necessary: as, he escaped minus his hat and coat; a gun minus its lock. [Colloq. or humorous.]—5. Lacking positive value; wanting. [Colloq.]

His mathematics are decidedly minus, but the use of them is past long ago. C. A. Bristed, English University, p. 74.

Minus acceleration. See acceleration (b).

minuscula (mi-nus'kū-lä), n.; pl. minusculæ (-lē). [NL.: see minuscule.] Same as minuscule.

minuscule (mi-nus'kūl), a. and n. [= F. minuscule = Sp. minúscula = Pg. It. minuscolo, < NL. minuscula (sc. littera), fem. of L. minusculus, rather small; dim. of minor, minus, less: see minor, minus. Cf. majuscule.] I. a. Small; of reduced form, as a letter; of or pertaining to writing in minuscule.

Minuscule letters are cursive forms of the earlier uncials.
Isaac Taylor, The Alphabet, I. 71.

II. n. The kind of reduced alphabetical character which, originating in the seventh century, was from about the ninth substituted in writing for the large uncial previously in use, and from which the small letter of modern Greek and Roman alphabets was derived; hence, a small or lower-case letter in writing or printing, as distinguished from a capital or majuscule.

The minuscule arose in the 7th century as a cursive monastic script, more legible than the old cursive, and more rapidly written than the uncial, and constructed by a combination of the elements of both.
Isaac Taylor, The Alphabet, II. 160.

The period of the uncials runs from the date of the earliest specimens on papyrus to the 9th century, that of the minuscule from the 9th century to the invention of printing. Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 145.

minutary (min'i-tā-ri), a. [< minute[2], n., + -ary.] Consisting of minutes. [Rare.]

This their clock gathering up the least crumb of time, presenting the minutary fractions thereof.
Fuller, Worthies, Berkshire.

minute[1] (mi-nūt'), a. [= F. menu = Pr. menut = Sp. menudo = Pg. miudo = It. minuto, < L. minutus, little, small, minute, pp. of minuere, make smaller, lessen, diminish, < minu-, stem of minor, smaller, less, minimus, smallest, least: see minor and min[2].] 1. Very small, diminutive, or limited; extremely little in dimensions, extent, or amount.

We have also glasses and means to see small and minute bodies perfectly and distinctly. Bacon, New Atlantis.

He was fond of detail—no little thing was too minute for his delicate eye.
Theodore Parker, Historic Americans, Washington.

2. Very small in scope or degree; relating to or consisting of small points or matters; particular; closely precise or exact: as, minute details of directions; minute criticism.—3. Attending to very small particulars; marking or noting little things or precise details; very close or careful: as, minute observation.

These minute philosophers . . . plunder all who come in their way. Berkeley, Minute Philosopher, i.

If we wish to be very minute, we pronounce the i in the first syllable long. Walker.

Bacon was fond of display, and unused to pay minute attention to domestic affairs. Macaulay, Lord Bacon.

Minute anatomy. See anatomy.—Syn. 1. Little, diminutive, slender, fine.—2. Circumstantial, Particular, Minute, exact, detailed. A circumstantial account gives the facts in detail; while circumstantial may include only the leading circumstances, a particular account gleans more closely, gathering all that are of any importance or interest; a minute account details even the slightest facts, perhaps those that are trivial and tedious.

★minute[2] (min'it), n. and a. [< ME. minute, mynute, mynet (in comp. also mynt-), a minute (of time), a moment (also a small piece of money), = MD. minute, D. minuut = G. minute = Sw. Dan. minut, < OF. minute, F. minute, f., = Sp. Pg. It. minuto, < LL. minutum, a small portion or piece. ML., a small part (of time), a minute, neut. of minutus, small: see minute[1].] I. n. 1†. Something very small; an unimportant particular; a petty detail; a trifle; specifically, a mite or half-farthing.

But whanne a pore widewe was come, sche cast two mynutis, that is, a ferthing. Wyclif, Mark xii. 42.

Let me hear from thee every minute of news.
B. Jonson, Staple of News, i. 2.

Curious of minutes, and punctual in rites and ceremonials, but most negligent and incurious of judgment and the love of God. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 268.

2. The sixtieth part of any unit. Especially—(a) The sixtieth part of an hour; loosely, a short space of time.

Euery degree of the bordure contieneth 4 minutes—that is to seyn, minutes of an howre. Chaucer, Astrolabe.

For the lachesse
Of halfe a minute of an houre,
Fro first he began laboure,
He loste all that he had do.
Gower, Conf. Amant., iv.

Nor all the pleasures there
Her mind could ever move one minute's stay to make.
Drayton, Polyolbion, vi. 33.

(b) In geom., the sixtieth part of a degree of angle or arc. Division of units by sixtieths is the characteristic of the Babylonian system. Ptolemy, following the Babylonian astronomers, divides the diameter of the circle into 120 tmemata or degrees, and these into sixty parts and these again into sixty parts. These subdivisions were translated into Latin as partes minutæ primæ and partes minutæ secundæ, whence our minutes (primes) and seconds. In modern astronomical works minutes of time are denoted by the initial letter m, and minutes of a degree of angle or arc by an acute accent (′). See degree, 8.

Aftre goynge be See and be Londe toward this Contree of that I have spoke, and to other Yles and Londes bezonde that Contree, I have founden the Sterre Antartyk of 33 Degrees of heghte, and mo mynutes.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 181.

(c) In arch., the sixtieth part of the diameter of a column at the base, being a subdivision used for measuring the minuter parts of an order. See module.

3. A written summary of an agreement or of a transaction, interview, or proceedings; a note to preserve the memory of anything: usually in the plural. Specifically, the minutes are the record of the proceedings at a meeting of a corporation, board, society, church court, or other deliberative body, put in writing by its secretary or other recording officer.

When I came to my chambers, I writ down these minutes.
Steele, Spectator, No. 454.

Into all the duties he had to perform he brought what is better than "Treasury minute" or rule or precedent—a warm heart, a careful conscience, and a good head.
Westminster Rev., CXXV. 92.

= Syn. Instant, etc. See moment.

II. a. 1. Repeated every minute: as, a minute gun.—2. Made in a minute or a very short time: as, a minute pudding; minute beer.—Minute bell, a bell tolled at intervals of a minute as a sign of mourning.—Minute gun, one of a series of discharges of cannon separated by intervals of a minute, in token of mourning, as at the funeral of a military officer of rank, or of distress, as on board a vessel at sea.

minute[2] (min′it), v. t.; pret. and pp. minuted, ppr. minuting. [< minute[2], n.] To set down in a short sketch or note; make a minute or memorandum of; enter in the minutes or record of transactions of a corporation, etc.

miotaxy (mī′ō-tak-si), n. [NL., < Gr. μείων, less, + τάξις, arrangement.] The suppression of an entire whorl of the members of any organ in a flower, as the sepals, petals, stamens, or styles. The androecium and gynœcium are most frequently suppressed, producing male or female flowers exclusively, as the case may be. Also spelled meiotaxy.

miourt, n. See mier[1].

mi-parti (mē′pär-tē′), a. [F., < mi (< L. medius), half, + parti, part: see medium and party.] 1. Of two colors and equally or nearly equally divided between them: as, mi-parti hose, of which one leg is of a different color from the other.—2. In her., divided per pale half-way down the escutcheon, the partition-line being met at the fesse-point by some other line, which must also be expressed in the blazon.

mir (mēr), n. [Russ. mirŭ, union, concord, peace, also world, = OBulg. mirŭ, peace, world, = Serv. Bohem. Pol. mir = Albanian mir = Lett. mers, peace.] A Russian commune; a community of Russian peasants. The rural population of Russia has been from ancient times organized into mirs or local communities, in which the land is held in common, the parts of it devoted to cultivation being allotted by general vote to the several families for varying terms. Redistributions and equalization of lots take place from time to time. Houses and orchards are theoretically the property of the mir, but usually remain for a long time under the same ownership. Meadows and forests are frequently apportioned, and there is generally a common for grazing. Every mir in matters of local concern governs itself through its own assemblies and elected officers.

mirabilary† (mī-rab′i-lā-ri), n. [Prop. mirabiliary, q. v.: see mirable.] A relater of wonders.

The use of this work . . . is nothing less than to give contentment to the appetite of curious and vain wits, as the manner of the mirabilaries is to do.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

mirabile dictu (mī-rab′i-lē dik′tū). [L.: mirabile, wonderful; dictu, abl. supine of dicere, say: see mirable and diction.] Wonderful to relate.

mirabile visu (mī-rab′i-lē vī′sū). [L.: mirabile, wonderful; visu, abl. supine of videre, see: see vision.] Wonderful to see.

mirabiliary† (mir-ą-bil′i-ą-ri), a. and n. [< LL. mirabiliarius, a worker of wonders or miracles, prop. adj., < L. mirabilis, wonderful: see mirable.] I. a. Having to do with the working or the relation of wonders.

And wee leaue to you the stile of Mirabiliary Miraclemongers. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 93.

II. n. A book in which wonderful things are noted; a treatise on miracles, portents, prodigies, omens, and the like.

Mirabilieæ (mī-rab-i-lī′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Choisy, 1849), < mirabilis + -eæ.] A tribe of dicotyledonous apetalous plants of the natural order Nyctagineæ, the four-o'clock family. The fruit is a utricle, surrounded by the base of the perianth, which keeps on growing after flowering; the embryo is much curved, with an elongated radicle. The tribe embraces 16 genera, Mirabilis being the type, and about 112 species, nearly all of which are confined to the western hemisphere.

Mirabilis (mī-rab′i-lis), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), < L. mirabilis, wonderful: see mirable.] A genus of nyctaginaceous plants, type of the tribe Mirabileæ. The flowers are surrounded by an involucre of united bracts, which remain unchanged after flowering: the elongated perianth is rarely campanulate. They are handsome branching herbs with opposite leaves, the lower ones petiolate and the upper sessile, and with quite large, often fragrant flowers, which are white, scarlet, or variegated, and arranged in branching cymes. There are 24 species, natives of the warmer parts of America. M. Jalapa is the common four-o'clock or marvel of Peru. A few other species are somewhat cultivated. See afternoon-ladies.

mirabilite (mī-rab'i-līt), n. [So named by Haidinger from the older chem. name sal mirabile (Glauber); < L. mirabilis, wonderful (see mirable), + *-ite*2.] A name given to the hydrous sulphate of sodium, or Glauber salt, occurring usually in a state of efflorescence about salt-springs. It is used as a substitute for soda in the manufacture of glass.

mirable† (mīr'a-bl), a. [= OF. mirable = Sp. (obs.) mirable = Pg. miravel = It. mirabile, < L. mirabilis, wonderful, < mirari, wonder at, < mirus, wonderful: see admire. Cf. marvel, a. and n., ult. < L. mirabilis, wonderful.] Wonderful.

Not Neoptolemus so mirable,
On whose bright crest Fame with her loud'st Oyes Cries "This is he!" Shak., T. and C., iv. 5. 142.

mirabolane†, mirabolan†, n. See myrobalan.

miracle (mir'a-kl), n. [< ME. miracle, myracle, < OF. miracle, F. miracle = Pr. miracle = Sp. milagro = Pg. milagre = It. miracolo = D. G. Dan. Sw. mirakel, < L. miracŭlum, a wonderful work, a miracle, a wonder, < mirari, wonder at, < mirus, wonderful: see admire.] 1. A wonder, or a wonderful thing; something that excites admiration or astonishment.

Be not offended, nature's miracle,
Thou art allotted to be ta'en by me.
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., v. 3. 54.

He has faults,
Belike, though he be such a miracle.
Shirley, Love's Cruelty, i. 1.

I have beheld the Ephesian's miracle —
Its columns strew the wilderness.
Byron, Childe Harold, iv. 153.

How exquisitely minute,
A miracle of design!
Tennyson, Maud, xxiv. 1.

2. An effect in nature not attributable to any of the recognized operations of nature nor to the act of man, but indicative of superhuman power, and serving as a sign or witness thereof; a wonderful work, manifesting a power superior to the ordinary forces of nature.

That Cyteetok Josue, be myracle of God and commandement of the Aungel, and destroyed it and cursed it, and alle hem that bylled it azen. Mandeville, Travels, p. 98.

Rabbi, we know that thou art a teacher come from God: for no man can do these miracles that thou doest except God be with him. John iii. 2.

Miracles have been wrought to convert idolaters and the superstitious, because no light of nature extendeth to declare the will and true worship of God.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii. 152.

To speak properly, there is not one miracle greater than another, they being the extraordinary effects of the hand of God, to which all things are of an equal facility.
Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, i. 17.

A miracle may be accurately defined a transgression of a law of Nature by a particular volition of the Deity, or by the interposition of some invisible agent.
Hume, Human Understanding, Of Miracles, x., note.

What are miracles? They are the acts and manifestations of a Spiritual Power in the universe, superior to the powers and laws of matter. Channing, Perfect Life, p. 248.

The definition of a miracle as a violation of the laws of nature is, in reality, an employment of language which, in the face of the matter, cannot be justified.
Huxley, Hume, p. 129.

3†. A miraculous story; a legend.

Whan seyd was al this miracle, every man
As sobre was, that wonder was to se.
Chaucer, Prol. to Sir Thopas, l. 1.

4. In the middle ages, one of a class of spectacles or dramatic representations exhibiting the lives of the saints or other sacred subjects; a miracle-play, somewhat resembling that still held at Oberammergau in Bavaria. Compare *mystery*1, 4.

At marketts & myracles we medleth vs nevere.
Piers Plowman's Crede (E. E. T. S.), l. 107.

The theatrical exhibitions in London, in the twelfth century, were called Miracles, because they consisted of sacred plays, or representations of the miracles wrought by the holy confessors. Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 227.

To a miracle, wonderfully; admirably; beyond conception: as, he did his part to a miracle.

miracle† (mir'a-kl), v. [ME. miraclen; < miracle, n.] I. intrans. To work wonders or miracles.

mirador (mē-rä-dōr'), n.; pl. miradores (mē-rä-dō'rās). [Sp. (> Pg. miradouro = F. miradore), < mirar, behold: see mirage, mirror.] A belvedere or gallery commanding an extensive view. See cut under belvedere.

Meantime your valiant son, who had before Gain'd fame, rode round to every mirador.
Dryden, Conquest of Granada, I. i. 1.

When he departed from the Alhambra, she betook herself to her mirador, overlooking the vega, whence she watched the army, as it went, in shining order, along the road leading to Loxa. Irving, Granada, p. 107.

mirage (mi-räzh'), n. [< F. mirage (= Pg. miragem = It. miragio), < mirer, < ML. mirare, look at: see mirror.] 1. An optical illusion due to excessive bending of light-rays in traversing adjacent layers of air of widely different densities, whereby distorted, displaced, or inverted images are produced. The requisite change in density arises only near the earth's surface, and the hot shining of the sun seems to be an invariable antecedent. The mirage of the desert presents an appearance of objects reflected in a surface of water; in this case the heated earth rarefies the air in the lower strata faster than it can escape, and the flatness of the ground conduces to the maintenance of the resulting abnormal distribution of density. Displacement by mirage is commonly vertical, but is lateral when the density-gradient is more or less inclined to the vertical. Looming and fata Morgana are species of mirage. See these words.

1. Superior Mirage. 2. Inferior Mirage.

Hence — 2. Deceptiveness of appearance; a delusive seeming; an illusion.

The poetry which had preceded him [Chaucer] . . . at last had well nigh lost itself in chasing the mirage of allegory. Lowell, Study Windows, p. 285.

mirish (mīr'ish), a. [< mire[1] + -ish[1].] Miry.

miriti-palm (mir'i-ti-päm), n. Same as itapalm.

mirk, mirkily, etc. See murk[1], etc.

mirligoes, n. See merligoes.

miro (mē'rō), n. [Maori.] A New Zealand coniferous tree, Nageia ferruginea, called black pine by the colonists. It yields a hard brown timber suitable for turnery, cabinet-making, and civil architecture.

mirret, n. A Middle English form of myrrh.

mirror (mir'ọr), n. [Early mod. E. also mirrour, myrror; < ME. mirrour, myrrore, myrroure, myroure, mirour, < OF. mireor, mirour, mirur, F. miroir = Pr. mirador = It. miratore, miradore, a looking-glass (= Sp. mirador, a lookout, balcony: see mirador), < ML. as if miratorium,* < L. mirari, wonder at, ML. mirare (> It. mirare = Sp. Pg. mirar = F. mirer), look at, < mirus, wonderful: see admire, miracle.] 1. A polished surface, as of metal, or of glass backed by a metal or other opaque substance, used to reflect objects, especially to reflect the face or person as an aid in making the toilet. The mirrors of the ancients were of polished metal, as are those of the Japanese and some other Oriental nations. Glass mirrors, consisting of transparent glass with a backing of metal to act as the reflecting surface, did not become common until the sixteenth century. Mirrors have been used for decoration of the person, being sewed to the material of the dress and serving as larger and more brilliant spangles; they have also been used in the interior decoration of buildings, especially in Persia and the East Indies. (Compare ardish.) The common method of preparing glass mirrors is to coat one side of the glass with an amalgam of tin and mercury (called silvering); but mirrors are now often made by depositing pure silver on the glass.

> Now in this mirrour loke 3ou soo;
> In 3oure free wille the choice lijs.
> To heuen or helle whither ge wille goo.
> Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 78.
>
> In this mirrour she shall see
> Her self as much transform'd as me.
> Congreve, Semele, iii. 3.

2. Specifically, in optics, a surface of glass or polished substance that forms images by the reflection of rays of light; a speculum. Optical mirrors are plane, convex, or concave. A plane mirror gives a virtual image whose apparent position is on the opposite side of the mirror from the reflected body and at an equal distance from it. A concave spherical mirror (supposing that it includes only a small part of a large spherical surface) reflects rays parallel to its axis, as those from the sun, to a point (F in fig. 1) called the principal focus, whose distance from the mirror is equal to half the radius of the sphere of which the surface of the mirror forms a part. Rays proceeding from a luminous point upon the axis beyond the center (L in fig. 2) are reflected to a focus, f, between the center and F; and these two points are called conjugate foci, since they are interchangeable; a luminous body at L has a real inverted and diminished image formed at f. If, however, the luminous body be at f, the image is formed at L, also real and inverted, but magnified. If the luminous body is at F, the principal focus, the reflected rays are sent out in parallel lines; if nearer the mirror than F, the rays after reflection are divergent, and the image is virtual, erect, and magnified. In a concave parabolic mirror parallel rays are brought exactly to a focus at the geometrical focus; hence this form is suitable for reflectors, as in the headlight of a locomotive. The images formed by convex mirrors are always virtual and smaller than the object.

Fig. 1. C, center; F, focus.

Fig. 2. C, center; F, focus.

3. Figuratively, that in or by which anything is shown or exemplified; hence, a pattern; an exemplar.

> That book [the Koran] seythe also that Jesu was sent from God alle myghty for to ben Myrour and Ensample and Tokne to alle men. Mandeville, Travels, p. 133.
>
> How farest thou, mirror of all martial men?
> Shak., 1 Hen. VI., i. 4. 74.

4. In arch., a small oval ornament surrounded by a concave molding; a simple form of cartouche.—5. In ornith., same as speculum.—Archimedean mirror, a mirror intended for burning an enemy's ships or hoardings: proposed or essayed more than once in the middle ages, in imitation of the mirrors mentioned by Lucian as used by Archimedes. Grose, Mil. Antiq., II. 167.—Axis of a spherical, concave, or convex mirror. See axis[1].—Claude Lorrain mirror, a blackened convex glass designed to show the effect of a landscape reflected in somewhat exaggerated perspective: so called from the fancied similarity of its effects to the pictures of Claude Lorrain (1600–82), a landscape-painter celebrated for his rendering of sunlight and shadow and light-effects in general. Also called Claude glass.—Conjugate mirrors. See conjugate.—Cylindrical mirror. See cylindric.—Easel-mirror, a small mirror having a prop or foot fastened to the back of it by a hinge so that, at pleasure, the mirror may be set up on one edge.—Magic mirror. (a) A mirror in which, in various systems of fortune-telling or divination, a person was supposed to see reflected scenes in his future life, or an answer to some question. (b) A Japanese mirror of cast-metal, which, when made to reflect the sun's rays upon a screen at a proper distance, shows in the reflection bright images which are counterparts of raised figures or characters on the back of the mirror. These, like all Japanese mirrors, are generally circular in form, are about one eighth of an inch thick in the thinnest part, and are usually surrounded on the back by a raised rim. The surface of the mirror is generally slightly convex, and coated with an amalgam of mercury and the metal forming the mirror. The surface is locally modified in its curvature by the characters, either by the shrinkage of the metal in cooling or by its deformation in the process of amalgamation or of polishing. Only a few of the mirrors which apparently answer to the general description in respect to their construction possess the "magic" property in any great degree.—Soemmering's mirror, in microscopy, a plane mirror of polished steel, smaller than the pupil of the eye, placed before the eyepiece of the microscope to be used like the camera lucida in making drawings.

mirror (mir'ọr), v. t. [< mirror, n.] To reflect in or as in a mirror.

> Bending to her open eyes,
> Where he was mirror'd small in paradise.
> Keats, Lamia, ii.
>
> Fiction . . . more than any other branch of literature mirrors the popular philosophy of the hour.
> Contemporary Rev., XLIX. 590.

mirror-black (mir'ọr-blak), a. An epithet applied to any ceramic ware having a lustrous black glaze, especially a rare and highly esteemed Japanese stoneware of ancient manufacture.

mirror-carp (mir'ọr-kärp), n. A variety of the common carp, Cyprinus carpio, in which the skin is mostly naked, but has patches of very large scales on the back and also above the anal fin, and on the tail and the posterior part of the lateral line. It is the result of artificial selection and domestication, and is regarded as a better table-fish than the ordinary carp. See cut under carp[2].

mirror-galvanometer (mir'ọr-gal-va-nom″e-tėr), n. A galvanometer with a mirror attached to the needle which reflects a beam of light intercepted by a scale of equal parts. The spot of light on the scale serves as an index.—Thomson's mirror-galvanometer. See galvanometer.

mirror-script (mir'ọr-skript), n. Writing as seen (reversed) in a mirror. Such writing is characteristic of a certain form of aphasia.

mirror-stone† (mir'ọr-stōn), n. Muscovite: so called because it "represents the image of that which is set behind it." E. Phillips, 1706.

mirror-writer (mir'ọr-rī″tėr), n. One who writes mirror-script.

> Mirror-writers, it would appear, if they did not "live before Agamemnon," lived not very long after him; for the first seven letters of that chieftain's name are so written in an inscription in the Louvre (Hall of Phidias, 69).
> Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, III. 41.

mirth (mėrth), n. [< ME. mirth, mirthe, merthe, murth, myrthe, murthe, murgthe, < AS. mirigth, mirgth, mirhth, myrth, pleasure, joy: with abstract formative -th, < mirig, myrig, pleasant: see merry[1].] 1†. Pleasure; joy.

> For-thi god of his goodnesse the fyrste gome Adam,
> Sette hym in solace and in souereigne myrthe.
> Piers Plowman (B), xviii. 217.
>
> He schall brynge tham to blys
> That nowe in bale are bonne,
> This myrthe we may not mys,
> For this same is Goddis sonne.
> York Plays, p. 189.

2. A state or feeling of merriment; demonstrative gaiety; jollity; hilarity.

> So mekill mirth gan with tham mete
> Of nobill noyse and sauore swete.
> Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 76.
>
> Present mirth hath present laughter.
> Shak., T. N., ii. 3. 49.
>
> Great was the mirth in the kitchen,
> Likewise intill the ha'.
> Earl Richard (Child's Ballads, III. 276).

3. A cause or subject of merriment; that which excites gaiety or laughter. [Rare.]

> Fayn wolde I don yow mirthe, wiste I how.
> And of a mirthe I am right now bythought,
> To doon you ese, and it shal coste nought.
> Chaucer, Prol. to C. T., l. 767.
>
> He's all my exercise, my mirth, my matter.
> Shak., W. T., i. 2. 166.

=Syn. Mirth, Cheerfulness.

I have always preferred cheerfulness to mirth. The latter I consider as an act, the former as a habit, of the mind. Mirth is short and transient; cheerfulness, fixed and permanent. Those are often raised into the greatest transports of mirth who are subject to the greatest depressions of melancholy; on the contrary, cheerfulness (though it does not give the mind such an exquisite gladness) prevents us from falling into any depths of sorrow. Mirth is like a flash of lightning, that breaks through a gloom of clouds, and glitters for a moment; cheerfulness keeps up a kind of daylight in the mind, and fills it with a steady and perpetual serenity. Addison, Spectator, No. 381.

mirth† (mėrth), v. [< ME. mirthen; < mirth, n.] I. trans. To please or make merry.

> Lorde, som prayer thou kenne vs,
> That somewhat myght mirthe vs or mende vs.
> York Plays, p. 241.

II. intrans. To rejoice. Halliwell.

mirthful (mėrth'fûl), a. [< mirth + -ful.] 1. Full of mirth or gaiety; characterized by or accompanied with merriment; jovial; festive.

> The Feast was serv'd: the Bowl was crown'd;
> To the King's Pleasure went the mirthful round.
> Prior, Solomon, ii.

The mirthful is the aspect of ease, freedom, abandon, and animal spirits. The serious is constituted by labour, difficulty, hardship, and the necessities of our position, which give birth to the severe and constraining institutions of government, law, morality, education, etc.
A. Bain, Emotions and Will, p. 251.

2. Causing or provoking mirth or merriment.

> And now what rests, but that we spend the time
> With stately triumphs, mirthful comic shows?
> Shak., 3 Hen. VI., v. 7. 44.
>
> Tell mirthful tales in course that fill the room with laughter. Beau. and Fl., Maid's Tragedy, i. 1.

=Syn. 1. Jovial, etc. (see jolly), gay, gleeful, sportive, playful.

mirthfully (mėrth'fûl-i), adv. In a mirthful or jovial manner: as, the visitors were mirthfully disposed.

mirthfulness (mėrth'fûl-nes), n. The state of being mirthful; mirth; merriment.

> A trait which naturally goes along with inability so to conceive the future as to be influenced by the conception is a childish mirthfulness—merriment not sobered by thought of what is coming.
> H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 34.

mirthless (mėrth'les), a. [< mirth + -less.] Without mirth or hilarity; joyless.

> Whilst his gamesome cut-tailed cur
> With his mirthless master plays.
> Drayton, Shepherd's Sirena.

mirthlessness (mėrth'les-nes), n. Absence of mirth.

mirtle†, n. An obsolete spelling of myrtle.

miry (mīr'i), a. [< ME. myry; < mire[1] + -y[1].] Abounding with mire or mud; of the nature of mire or mud; full of mire: as, a miry road; a miry lane.

> Thou should'st have heard in how miry a place, how she was bemoiled. Shak., T. of the S., iv. 1. 77.

miryachit (mėr-yä'chit), n. [Russ., 'to be epileptic.'] A neurosis observed in Siberia, characterized by extreme excitability and sometimes exhibitions of terror, with imitation of word and deed and often obscene speech. It is similar to or identical with the latah of southern Asia and the affection of Jumpers or jumping Frenchmen of Maine.

mirza (mir'zä or mėr'zä), n. [Pers. mīrzā (> Hind. mirzā, prop. mīrzā), prince; said to be a corruption of amīrzadeh, son of a prince, < amīr, prince, ameer (see ameer, amir), + zadeh, son; cf. mīr, a lord, chief, prob. for amīr.] A Persian title. When placed after the name of a person it designates him as a royal prince; when before the name it is the title for a scholar.

mist†, n. and adv. A Middle English form of miss[1].

mis-[1]. [< ME. mis-, mys-, improp. mysse-, < AS. mis- = OS. mis- = OFries. mis- = D. mis- = MLG. mis- = OHG. missa-, missi-, MHG. misse-, G. miss-, mis- = Icel. mis- = Sw. miss- = Dan. mis- = Goth. missa-, a prefix, 'wrong,' 'bad,' as in AS. misdǣd, a wrong deed, misdeed, misrǣd, bad advice, misdōn, do wrong, misdo, mislǣdan, mislead, mistǣcan, misteach, miswrītan, miswrite, etc.; orig. an independent word, 'wrong,' 'erroneous,' 'having missed': see miss[1].] A prefix of Anglo-Saxon origin, meaning 'wrong,' 'bad,' 'erroneous,' or, taken adverbially, 'wrongly,' 'badly,' 'erroneously,' prefixed to nouns, as in misdeed, misfortune, misinform, etc., and verbs, misdo, miscarry, misguide, misrule, etc., including participles, as mistaking, misbelieving, etc., mistaken, misspent, etc. It is different from the prefix in mischance, mischief, miscount, etc., with which it is more or less confused. (See mis-[2].) The prefix mis-[1] is never accented; the prefix mis-[2] has the accent in some of the older words, as mischief, miscreant, where its force as a prefix is no longer felt. In the following words in mis-, the prefix is uniformly given as mis-[1] except when the word in which it occurs can be traced to an Old French source. In such forms as misadjustment, etc., it is often indifferent whether the formation be regarded as mis-[1] + adjustment or as misadjust + -ment.

mis-[2]. [< ME. mis-, mys-, mes-, < OF. mes-, F. mé-, mes-, Pr. mes-, mens- = Sp. Pg. menos- = It. mis-, < L. minus, less; used in Rom. as a depreciatory prefix: see minus.] A prefix of Latin origin, meaning literally 'minus,' 'less,' and hence used in Romance, etc., as a depreciative or negative prefix, as in misadventure, mischance, mischief, miscount, miscreant, misnomer, etc. It is mostly merged with mis-[1], from which in most cases it can be distinguished only by the etymology of the word.

misacceptation (mis-ak-sep-tā'shon), n. [< mis-[1] + acceptation.] The act of taking or understanding in a wrong sense; a false acceptation.

misacception† (mis-ak-sep'shon), n. [< mis-[1] + acception.] Misacceptation.

> The apostle, . . . contemning all impotent misacceptions, calls them what he finds them, a froward generation.
> Bp. Hall, Sermon to the Lords, Feb. 18, 1634.

misaccount† (mis-a-kount'), v. t. [< ME. misacounten, misaccompten, < OF. mesacompter*, count wrongly, < mes- + acompter, account: see mis-[2] and account.] To miscalculate; misreckon.

> He thoghte he mysacounted hadde his day.
> Chaucer, Troilus, v. 1185.

misachievement (mis-a-chēv'ment), n. [< mis-[1] + achievement.] Wrong-doing; an achievement that is not desirable or commendable. Davies.

> Let them sink into obscurity that hope to swim in credit by such mis-achievements.
> Fuller, Worthies, Cornwall, I. 306.

misact (mis-akt'), v. t. [< mis-[1] + act.] To act or perform badly.

> The player that misacts an inferior and unnoted part carries it away without censure.
> Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 391. (Davies.)

misadjust (mis-a-just'), v. t. [< mis-[1] + adjust.] To adjust badly; put out of adjustment. Jer. Taylor.

misadjustment (mis-a-just'ment), n. [< mis-[1] + adjustment.] The state or condition of being badly adjusted; disagreement; lack of harmony.

> The misadjustment of nature to our physical being.
> Mark Hopkins, Discussions for Young Men, p. 228.

misadmeasurement (mis-ad-mezh'ūr-ment), n. [< mis-[1] + admeasurement.] A faulty estimate or measurement.

> The liability of the understanding to underrate or to overvalue the importance of an object through mere misadmeasurement of its propinquity. E. A. Poe, Sphinx.

misadventure (mis-ad-ven'tūr), n. [< ME. misaventure, mesaventure, messauenture, contr. misaunter, mysaunter, < OF. mesaventure, F. mésaventure, < mes- + aventure, adventure: see mis-[2] and adventure.] An unfortunate adventure or hap; a mischance; ill luck.

> Certes, it were to vs grete harme yef this deuell lyve longe, what mysauenture hath he be suffred so longe.
> Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 589.
>
> Your looks are pale and wild, and do import
> Some misadventure. Shak., R. and J., v. 1. 29.

Homicide by misadventure. See homicide[2].

misadventured† (mis-ad-ven'tūrd), a. [< misadventure + -ed[2].] Unfortunate.

> A pair of star-cross'd lovers take their life;
> Whose misadventured piteous overthrows
> Do with their death bury their parents' strife.
> Shak., R. and J., Prol., l. 7.

misadventurous (mis-ad-ven'tūr-us), a. [Cf. OF. mesaventureux; as misadventure + -ous.] Characterized by misadventure; unfortunate.

> The tidings of our misadventurous synod.
> Sir H. Taylor, Edwin the Fair, iv. 1. (Davies.)

misadvertence (mis-ad-vėr'tens), n. [< mis-[1] + advertence.] Want of proper care, heed, or attention; inadvertence.

> Once by misadvertence Merlin sat
> In his own chair [the Siege Perilous].
> Tennyson, Holy Grail.

misadvice (mis-ad-vīs'), n. [< mis-[1] + advice.] Bad advice; injudicious counsel. Ash.

misadvise (mis-ad-vīz'), v. t.; pret. and pp. misadvised, ppr. misadvising. [< ME. misadvisen, misavisen; < mis-[1] + advise.] 1. To give bad advice to.

> If it be whan they hem misavise.
> Chaucer, Prol. to Wife of Bath's Tale.

2. To misinform; deceive; cause or lead to act under a misapprehension.

> Pardon my passion, I was misadvised.
> B. Jonson, Magnetick Lady, iv. 2.
>
> Here also happened another pageant in a certain monk (if I be not misadvised) of Gloucester College.
> Foxe (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 108).

misadvisedly (mis-ad-vī'zed-li), adv. Under a misapprehension; inconsiderately.

misadvisedness (mis-ad-vī'zed-nes), n. The state of being misadvised or under a misapprehension; the state of being mistaken.

> Unadvisedness coupled with heedlessness, and misadvisedness coupled with rashness, correspond to the culpa sine dolo.
> Bentham, Introd. to Morals and Legislation, ix. 17.

misaffect† (mis-a-fekt'), v. t. [< mis-[1] + affect[1].] To dislike.

> That peace which you have hitherto so perversely misaffected. Milton, On Lett. of Humb. Remonst.

misaffected† (mis-a-fek'ted), a. [< mis-[1] + affected.] Ill-affected; ill-disposed.

> These men are farther yet misaffected, and in a higher strain. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 575.

misaffection† (mis-a-fek'shon), n. [< mis-[1] + affection.] A wrong affection.

> Earthly and grosse with misaffections, . . . it ushers the flesh of sinful courses. Bp. Hall, Character of Man.

misaffirm (mis-a-fėrm'), v. t. [< mis-[1] + affirm.] To affirm incorrectly or wrongly.

> The truth of what they themselves know to be here misaffirm'd. Milton, Eikonoklastes, Pref.

misaimed (mis-āmd'), a. [< mis-[1] + aimed.] Not rightly aimed or directed. Spenser.

misallegation† (mis-al-ē-gā'shon), n. [< mis-[1] + allegation.] An incorrect or false statement or assertion. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 361.

misallege (mis-a-lej'), v. t.; pret. and pp. misalleged, ppr. misalleging. [< mis-[1] + allege[1].] To allege erroneously; cite falsely as a proof or argument.

> Now-a-days they are only used to exclude and drive forth episcopacy; but then they misallege antiquity.
> Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 248.

misalliance (mis-a-lī'ans), n. [< F. mésalliance, < mes- + alliance, alliance: see mis-[2] and alliance.] An improper alliance or association; specifically, a marriage relation considered as degrading to one of the parties, owing to the inferior birth or standing of the other: in the latter sense often used in the French form, mésalliance.

> Their purpose was to ally two things in nature incompatible, the Gothic and the classic unity; the effect of which misalliance was to discover and expose the nakedness of the Gothic. Bp. Hurd, Chivalry and Romance, viii.

misallied (mis-a-līd'), a. [< mis-[1] + allied.] Improperly allied or connected; affected by a misalliance.

> A misallied and disparaged branch of the house of Nimrod. Burke, Letter to a Noble Lord.

misallotment (mis-a-lot'ment), n. [< mis-[1] + allotment.] A wrong allotment.

misalter† (mis-ål'tėr), v. t. [< mis-[1] + alter.] To alter wrongly or for the worse.

> These are all . . . which have so mis-altered the leiturgy that it can no more be known to be itself.
> Bp. Hall, Ans. to Apol. for Smectymnuus, § 2.

misanswer† (mis-an'sėr), n. [< mis-[1] + answer.] Misuse; failure.

> After the misanswer of the one talent.
> Bp. Hall, Vayle of Moses.

misanthrope (mis'an-thrōp), n. [= F. misanthrope = Sp. misántropo = Pg. misanthropo = It. misantropo, < Gr. μισάνθρωπος, hating mankind, < μισεῖν, hate (< μῖσος, hatred), + ἄνθρωπος, a man: see anthropic. Cf. philanthrope.] A hater of mankind; one who harbors dislike or distrust of human character or motives in general.

> Alas! poor dean! his only scope
> Was to be held a misanthrope.
> Swift, Death of Dr. Swift.

misanthropic (mis-an-throp'ik), a. [= F. misanthropique = Sp. misantrópico = Pg. misanthropico = It. misantropico; as misanthrope + -ic.] Having the character of a misanthrope; characteristic of a misanthrope or of misanthropy. =Syn. Cynical, Misanthropic, Pessimistic. Cynical expresses a perverse disposition to put an unfavorable interpretation upon conduct, or to exercise austerity under profession of a belief in the worthlessness of any offered form of enjoyment. Misanthropic expresses a hatred of mankind as a race. Pessimistic is primarily and generally a philosophical epithet, applying to those who hold that the tendency of things is only or on the whole toward evil. Byron's Childe Harold is "a jaded and misanthropic voluptuary"; such a person is apt to take a cynical view of others, in their motives, their virtues, their happiness, etc. It is disputed whether Swift's "Gulliver's Travels" is really misanthropic or only cynical.

misanthropical (mis-an-throp'i-kal), a. [< misanthropic + -al.] Same as misanthropic.

misanthropically (mis-an-throp'i-kal-i), adv. In a misanthropic manner.

misanthropist (mis-an'thrō-pist), n. [As misanthrope + -ist.] Same as misanthrope.

misanthropize (mis-an'thrō-pīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. misanthropized, ppr. misanthropizing. [As misanthrope + -ize.] To render misanthropic. [Rare.]

misanthropost†, n. [< Gr. μισάνθρωπος: see misanthrope.] A misanthrope; a man-hater.

> I am Misanthropos, and hate mankind.
> Shak., T. of A., iv. 3. 53.

misanthropy (mis-an'thrō-pi), n. [= F. misanthropie = Sp. misantropía = Pg. misanthropia = It. misantropia, < Gr. μισανθρωπία, hatred of men, < μισάνθρωπος, hating man: see misanthrope.] Hatred or dislike of mankind; the habit of distrusting or of taking the worst possible view of human character or motives.

> But let not knaves misanthropy create,
> Nor feed the gall of universal hate.
> Langhorne, Enlargement of the Mind, i.
>
> Misanthropy is only philanthropy turned sour.
> J. F. Clarke, Self-Culture, p. 228.

misapplication (mis-ap-li-kā'shon), n. [< mis-[1] + application.] A wrong or false application or purpose.

> He brings me informations, pick'd out of broken words in men's common talk, which, with his malicious misapplication, he hopes will seem dangerous.
> Beau. and Fl., Woman-Hater, i. 3.

misapply (mis-a-plī'), v. t.; pret. and pp. misapplied, ppr. misapplying. [< mis-[1] + apply.] To make an erroneous application of; apply or dispose of wrongly: as, to misapply a name or title; to misapply one's talents or exertions; to misapply public money.

> Virtue itself turns vice, being misapplied.
> Shak., R. and J., ii. 3. 21.

=Syn. 2. Mischance, Mishap, Misfortune, Disaster, Calamity, Catastrophe, misadventure, ill, harm, reverse, blow, stroke, trouble. The first six words are arranged in the order of strength; they agree in denoting untoward events, produced by causes presumably independent of the sufferer. Mischance is the lightest word for that which is really disagreeable; a mishap may be comparatively a trivial thing; both generally apply to the experience of individuals. Misfortune is the most general of these words; a misfortune is a really serious matter; it may befall a person, family, or nation. A very serious misfortune affecting large numbers is a calamity, the central idea of which is wide-spread and general mischief. A disaster is not necessarily wide-spread; it is generally sudden, and its importance is in its effects upon other interests, as marring or ruining particular plans, hopes, courses, or conditions of things. A disaster may befall an individual; a calamity can come to an individual only by affecting his welfare largely, or bringing him into deep distress. A catastrophe is strictly a great misfortune bringing things to an end, a final crash, a finishing stroke: as, this brought on the catastrophe. See affliction.

misfortune† (mis-fôr'tụ̄n), v. i. [< misfortune, n.] To fall out unfortunately or unhappily; fail or miscarry.

Mishnah (mish′nä), n. [Also Mishna; Heb. mishnāh, repetition, explanation, < shānāh, repeat.] 1. In Jewish lit., a collection of halachoth or binding precepts and legal decisions deduced by the ancient rabbis from the Pentateuch, and itself forming a second or oral law. See halachah. These halachoth, which had been preserved for several centuries by tradition among the doctors of the synagogue, were gradually committed to writing. The first who attempted to reduce them to order was Hillel I. (B. C. 75–A. D. 10), president of the Sanhedrim, who arranged them in six Sedarim or orders. The final redaction, however, was made by Rabbi Jehudah, surnamed "the holy," about the end of the second century of our era. The Mishnah is divided into six parts, each of which contains a number of treatises, which are subdivided into chapters, and these again into paragraphs or mishnoth. The first part relates to agriculture; the second regulates the manner of observing festivals; the third treats of women and matrimonial cases; the fourth of damages and losses in trade, etc.; the fifth is on "holy things"—that is, oblations, sacrifices, etc.; and the sixth treats of the several sorts of purification. The Mishnah forms the text on which the Gemara is based. See Gemara and Talmud.

The Mishnah consists chiefly of Halakhah; there is, comparatively speaking, little Agadah to be found in it. It is not, however, as many think, either a commentary on the Halakhic portions of the Pentateuch, or on the ordinances of the Sopherim, or on both together. It rather presupposes the knowledge of and respect for both the Mosaic and the Sopheric laws, and it only discusses, and finally decides on, the best mode and manner of executing these. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 503.

2. [l. c.; pl. mishnoth (mish′noth).] A paragraph of the Mishnah.

A mishnah, if genuine, never begins with a passage of the Pentateuch, and even comparatively seldom brings direct proof from or gives reference to it.
Encyc. Brit., XVI. 503.

Mishnaic (mish-nā′ik), a. [< Mishna(h) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the Mishnah; traditional.

The weighty reference to the Mishnaic usage remains, however, in full force, however conservative be our decision on the date of Chronicles. Encyc. Brit., VIII. 561.

Mishnic (mish′nik), a. [< Mishna(h) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the Mishnah.

To correcten that is mis I mente.
Chaucer, Prol. to Canon's Yeoman's Tale, l. 446.

miss[2] (mis), n. [An abbr. of mistress, at first prob. as a title, the form Mistress, as written Mrs. and pronounced mis'ez, being still commonly abbreviated in rustic use in New England and among the Southern negroes, to Miss, often printed Mis'. Cf. also def. 3. See mistress, Mrs.] 1. Mistress: a reduced form of this title, which, so reduced, came to be regarded, when prefixed to the name of a young woman or girl, as a sort of diminutive, and was especially applied to young girls (corresponding to master as applied to young boys), older unmarried girls or women being styled mistress even in the lifetime of the mother; later, and in present use, a title prefixed to the name of any unmarried woman or girl. In a restricted use, the title Miss, with the surname only, now distinguishes the eldest daughter of a family, the younger daughters having the title Miss prefixed to their full name: as, Miss Brown, Miss Mary Brown, etc. Some matronly unmarried women, holding independent positions as householders or otherwise, are still styled Mistress (Mrs.) as a mark of special respect, at least in some parts of the United States. In speaking or writing of two or more persons of the same name by the title of Miss, the plural form is often given to the name as a whole, as the Miss Smiths, instead of to the title, as the Misses Smith.

The four Miss Willises. Dickens, Sketches, iii.

Miss Guest held her chin too high, and . . . Miss Laura spoke and moved continually with a view to effect.
George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, iv. 9.

Her says to me "Are you Mrs. or Miss?" "Neither, ma'am," I says, "I are a servant." That young woman respected herself and her calling.
N. and Q., 7th ser., VII. 256.

2. A young unmarried woman; a girl. In this sense chiefly colloquial; in trade use it has reference to sizes, etc.: as, ladies', misses', and children's shoes.

Where there are little masters and misses in a house, they are great impediments to the diversions of the servants. Swift.

Sometimes I half wish I were merely A plain or a penniless miss.
Locker, A Nice Correspondent.

3. A mistress (of a household). [Southern U. S., in negro use.]—4†. [In this use a direct abbr. of mistress in the same sense—a slang use, independent of the above.] A kept mistress.

She being taken to be the Earle of Oxford's misse (as at this time they began to call lewd women).
Evelyn, Diary, Jan. 9, 1662.

Undecent women, . . . inflaming severall young noblemen and gallants, became their misses.
Evelyn, Diary, Oct. 18, 1666.

If after all you think it a disgrace

The missal sacrifice. Bp. Hall.

Missal litanies. See litany, 2.

II. n. In the Rom. Cath. Ch., the book containing all the liturgical forms necessary for celebrating mass throughout the year. Originally the ordinary, canon, and some other parts of the mass were contained in the sacramentary, which also included the offices for the other sacraments. In addition to this the antiphonary, lectionary, and evangeliary had to be used. Early in the eighth century the name of missal (missalis (sc. liber), missale) came to be applied to the sacramentary, and later to books containing additional parts of the mass. A book like the modern missal, containing all the forms of the mass, was called a plenary missal (missale plenarium). The modern Roman missal (the "reformed missal") was issued substantially in its present form under Pius V. in 1570, and revised again under Clement VIII. and Urban VIII. It is the only Latin missal allowed to be used in the Roman Catholic Church, with the exception of the limited local use of the Ambrosian, Mozarabic, and some monastic rites. Roman Catholic priests in England do not follow the Sarum and other ancient English uses, but the present Roman rites. The Uniats and other Latinizing communities in Oriental countries are allowed to retain their ancient offices, with alterations more or less considerable. In the Roman missal, after the introductory matter (calendar, general rubrics, etc.) come the introits, collects, epistles, gospels, graduals, offertoria, secreta, communions, postcommunions, etc., throughout the year. The ordinary and canon of the mass are placed in the middle of the book, between the proper of Holy Saturday and that of Easter Sunday. After these masses de tempore follow the common of saints, votive and special masses, etc., and masses allowed to be used in special places. The euchologion of the Greek Church answers not to the missal, but to the original sacramentary.

The Sacramentary became subdivided into the full mass-book or missal properly so named.
Rock, Church of our Fathers, III. ii. 19.

As tender and reverential . . . as a nun over her missal.
O. W. Holmes, Autocrat, ii.

Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), i. 257.

mister[1] (mis'tėr), n. [Also dial. mester, measter, < ME. maister, mayster, etc., whence also E. master, of which mister is merely a variant form, now differentiated in use: see master[1].] 1. Master: a word which has lost its real meaning, and become a mere conventional title: nearly always written in the abbreviated form Mr. (a) Prefixed to the name of a gentleman, or now, by extension, to that of any man, as a conventional title of address or mention. [The abbreviation Mr. (also M.), as found in books of the sixteenth century and for some time later, is to be read Master. (Compare master[1], n., 7.) Mister is simply a weaker form of Master.]

Has his majesty dubb'd me a Knight for you to make me a Mister? Foote, Mayor of Garratt, i.

You will come down, Mister Bertram, as my guest to Wycombe Hall?
Mrs. Browning, Lady Geraldine's Courtship, xiii.

(b) Prefixed to the official designation of certain officers or dignitaries in formal address, as Mr. President, Mr. Secretary, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Chairman, Mr. Clerk.

You, Mr. Dean, frequent the great.
Pope, Imit. of Horace, II. vi. 113.

2. Sir: used alone, in address, when the man's name is not known: as, mister, you've dropped your gloves; have a paper, mister? [The disappearance of master and mister, and the restricted and obsolescent use of sir, as an unaccompanied term of address, and the like facts with regard to mistress, Mrs., and madam, tend to deprive the English language of polite terms of address to strangers. Sir and madam or ma'am as direct terms of address are old-fashioned and obsolescent in ordinary speech, and mister and lady in this use are confined almost entirely to the lower classes.]

mister[2] (mis'tėr), n. [< ME. mister, myster, mystir, mistere, misteir, mester, meister, mestier, < OF. mestier, mester, trade, calling, occupation, need, F. métier = Sp. mester = Pg. mester = It. mestiere, trade, calling, occupation, < L. ministerium, service, office, ministry: see ministry. Chapman (?), Alphonsus, Emperor of Germany, ii. 2.

Yes, there is the note and all the parts, if I misthink not.
B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels, iv. 1.

Thoughts which how found they harbour in thy breast,
Adam, misthought of her to thee so dear?
Milton, P. L., ix. 289.

II.† trans. To think ill of; have an erroneous or unfavorable opinion of.

How will the country, for these woful chances,
Misthink the king, and not be satisfied!
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., ii. 5. 108.

misthought† (mis-thât'), n. [< mis-[1] + thought.] Erroneous notion; mistaken opinion.

But I with better reason him aviz'd,
And shew d him how, through error and misthought
Of our like persons, eath to be disguiz d,
Or his exchange or freedom might be wrought.
Spenser, F. Q., IV. viii. 58.

Withals, Dict. (ed. 1608), p. 96. (Nares.)

mistle[2]†, v. i. An obsolete form of mizzle[1].

mistlethrush (mis'l-thrush), n. [Also commonly missel-thrush; formerly also miselthrush, missel-trush; so called because it is fond of the berries of the mistle or mistletoe; < mistle[1] + thrush[1]. Cf. equiv. G. misteldrossel (drossel = E. throstle) and mistler.] A species of thrush, the Turdus viscivorus, common in most parts of Europe, and some parts of western Asia and northern Africa. Like the fieldfare, mavis, redwing, blackbird, and ring-ouzel, it is an abundant and well-known English thrush. It is the largest European bird of its kind, measuring from 11 to 11½ inches in length and about 19½ in extent of wings. The form is stout, and the coloration most like that of the song-thrush, T. musicus. The upper parts are grayish-brown, grayer on the head, and of a yellowish tinge on the rump; there is a whitish streak from the bill over the eye, and the under parts are whitish, profusely spotted with black. Also called, locally, storm-cock, thrice-cock, holmthrush, screechthrush.

Mistlethrush (Turdus viscivorus).

We meet in Aristotle with one kind of thrush called the misel thrush, or feeder upon miseltoe.
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 6.

mistletoe (miz'- or mis'l-tō), n. [Formerly also misseltoe, misletoe, miseltoe, misleto, var. misseldeu, misseldine, miscleden; < ME. mistelton* (?), < AS. misteltān, mistiltān (= Icel. mistilteinn = Dan. mistelten), mistletoe, < mistel, bird-lime, also mistletoe, and basil, + tān, a twig: see mistle[1] and tan[2]. The second element, having passed out of common use as a separate word, suffered alteration to -toe, the radical final n being appar. taken as the old plural suffix -n.] 1. A European plant, Viscum album, of the family Loranthaceæ, growing parasitically on various trees. It is a jointed dichotomous shrub, with sessile, oblong, entire leaves, and small yellowish-green flowers, the whole forming a pendent bush, which is covered in winter with small white berries containing a glutinous substance. The shrub is said to be disseminated by birds, which eat the berries and disperse the undigested seeds in their droppings. It is found on a great variety of trees, especially the apple-tree, but seldom on the oak. The mistletoe (compare def. 2) was consecrated to religious purposes by the ancient Celtic nations of Europe, and was held in peculiar veneration by the Druids, especially when found growing on the oak. Traces of this old superstitious regard for the mistletoe still survive in European countries, as in the custom of kissing under it at Christmas. It was formerly highly esteemed as an antispasmodic, but is not now so used. It seems, however, to have some pharmaco-dynamic properties.

Branch of Mistletoe (Viscum album), with fruits.
a, longitudinal section through the male flower; b, the female inflorescence.

Like som rare Fruit-Tree over-topt with spight
Of Briers and Bushes . . .
Till choakt withall, it dies as they do growe,
And beareth nought but Moss and Misseltoe.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Vocation.

The mistletoe hung in the castle hall,
The holly branch shone on the old oak-wall.
T. H. Bayly, The Mistletoe Bough.

2. A plant of some other species of Viscum, or of one of the genera Loranthus, Phoradendron, and Razoumofskya, their species almost all having the same parasitic habit. The mistletoe (Viscum) mentioned by Latin writers in their account of the Druids is thought by some to have been Loranthus Europæus of southern Europe, which grows on Quercus Cerris and Q. pubescens. The mistletoe of the eastern United States is Phoradendron flavescens, common on various trees, especially the tupelo and red maple. See gad-bush.

mistlike (mist'līk), adv. [< mist[1] + like[2].] In the manner of a mist.

Mist-like, infold me from the search of eyes.
Shak., R. and J., iii. 3. 73.

mistradition (mis-trā-dish'on), n. [< mis-[1] + tradition.] A wrong or false tradition; misapplied tradition.

The huge corruptions of the Church, mistral (mis'tral), n. [< F. mistral = Sp. mistral, < Pr. mistral, OPr. maestral, lit. 'the master-wind,' < maestre, master, < L. magister, master: see master[1].] In southern France and vicinity, a cold and dry northerly wind which blows in furious gusts from time to time in much of that region, notably in winter. The mistral derives its peculiar properties from its slow descent to the Mediterranean; it extends from the mouth of the Ebro to the Gulf of Genoa, but is strongest and most frequent over Provence, and especially in the delta of the Rhone. Also written maestral.

When the Mistral blows, the sky is almost always blue and cloudless, and the air very dry; the contrast between the prevailing sunshine and the piercing cold of the wind is very striking. In the Rhone valley every second day is a Mistral day; in Marseilles it blows 175 days in the year.
Fischer.

It is only truth to say, however, that the mistral, an odious, cold, cutting northeast wind, blows here in the winter, and gives Avignon a bad name.
C. D. Warner, Roundabout Journey, i.

Raleigh, Hist. World, II. xxii. § 6.

But the manuscript is all in one simple, undisguised, feminine handwriting, and with no interlineation save only here and there the correction of a miswritten word.
The Century, XXXVIII. 799.

miswrought (mis-rât'), a. [< mis-[1] + wrought.] Badly done. Bacon.

misy (mis'i), n. [Also missy; < F. misy, < L. misy, < Gr. μίσυ, an ore supposed to be copperas; perhaps of Egyptian origin.] A sulphur-yellow mineral occurring in loose aggregations of small crystalline scales. It consists of hydrous sulphate of iron, and is derived from the decomposition of pyrite. Also called yellow copperas and copiapite.

misyoke (mis-yōk'), v. t. and i.; pret. and pp. misyoked, ppr. misyoking. [< mis-[1] + yoke, v.] To yoke or join unsuitably.

Perpetually and finally hindered in wedlock, by misyoking with a diversity of nature as well as of religion.
Milton, Divorce, ii. 19.

miszealous (mis-zel'us), a. [< mis-[1] + zealous.] Actuated by false zeal.

Go on now, ye miszealous spirits.
Bp. Hall, Noah's Dove.

mit, n. See mitt.

mita (mē'tä), n. [Sp., a tribute, payment: see mite[2].] Forced labor in mines, farms, and factories to which the Indians of Peru were formerly subjected. One seventh of the male population were subject to service for a year, for which they were to be paid, but they could not be taken beyond a specified distance from their homes.

mitaine†, n. A Middle English form of mitten.

mitcal (mit-käl'), n. Same as miskal.

mitch†, n. [< ME. micche, mycche, miche (cf. MD. MLG. micke), < OF. miche = Pr. mica, micha, a small loaf of bread, lit. a crumb, < L. mica, a crumb: see mica[1], mie.] A loaf of bread.

He that hath mycches tweyne,
Ne value in his demeigne,
Lyveth more at ese, and more is riche,
Than doth he that is chiche.
Rom. of the Rose, l. 5585.

mitch-board (mich'bōrd), n. Naut., a crutch for the support of a boom or mast. See crutch[1], 3 (d). [Local, Eng.]

Mitchella (mi-chel'ä), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1753), named after John Mitchell, a botanist of Virginia.] A genus of plants of the family Rubiaceæ and the tribe Anthospermeæ, characterized by having perfect flowers with a funnel-shaped corolla, which is from three- to six-lobed, the stamens inserted upon its throat, and by the hairy style, which has four thread-shaped lobes. They are creeping herbs, with opposite round-ovate leaves having minute stipules, and small white fragrant dimorphous flowers, which are axillary or terminal, and grow in pairs. The fruit is a scarlet berry-like double drupe. There are 2 species, an American, M. repens, the partridge-berry, and a closely related Japanese species. See partridge-berry.

★mite[1] (mīt), n. [< ME. mite, myte, < AS. mīte = MD. mijte, D. mijt = MLG. LG. mite = OHG. mīza, mizza, MHG. mīze, G. (after LG.) miete = Dan. mide (cf. F. mite, Sp. mita, ML. mita, < LG.), a mite; prob. lit. 'cutter,' 'biter,' from the verb shown in Goth. maitan = Icel. meita = AS. mētan*, cut: see emmet, ant[1].] 1. A small arachnidan of the order Acarida; any acarid. Mites once formed a comprehensive genus Acarus or family Acaridæ, terms not yet obsolete; but, with the introduction of many more genera, the establishment of several families, and the elevation of the group to the rank of an order, a more elaborate nomenclature has been established, in which neither Acarus nor Acaridæ is retained. (See Acarida.) Adult mites are eight-legged like most arachnidans; but some six-legged immature forms at one time constituted a supposed genus Leptus. (See Leptus, and cut under harvest-tick.) The species of mites are very numerous, diversified in form, and various in habits. Many are parasitic; others are terrestrial or aquatic; others live in cheese, flour, sugar, etc. Mite is consequently much used in composition. The cheese-mite or flour-mite is Tyroglyphus siro or T. longior; the sugar-mite is Glycïphagus prunorum, or another of the same genus. Such mites compose the family Tyroglyphidæ, and are among those longer known as species of Acarus or Acaridæ. Itch-mites are Sarcoptidæ, as Sarcoptes scabiei. (See cut under itch-mite.) Mange-mites are Demodicidæ; garden-mites or harvest-mites, Trombidiidæ; spinning-mites, Tetranychidæ; beetle-mites or wood-mites, Oribatidæ; spider-mites, Gamasidæ; water-mites, Hydrachnidæ; snout-mites, Bdellidæ; gall-mites, Eriophyidæ. Certain mites, the Ixodidæ, are commonly distinguished as ticks, as Ixodes ricinus (see cut under Acarida), and those of the family Trombidiidæ are indifferently called harvest-mites, harvest ticks, harvest bugs, red-bugs, and by other names. See the compound and technical names.

That cheese of itself breeds mites or maggots, I deny.
Ray, Works of Creation, ii.

Say what the use, were finer optics given,
To inspect a mite, not comprehend the heaven?
Pope, Essay on Man, i. 196.

2. Some insect like or likened to a mite, as a dust-louse (Psocus).

For life is so high a perfection of being that in this respect the least fly or mite is a more noble being than a star.
South, Works, III. x.

★mite[2] (mīt), n. [< ME. mite, myte (= OF. mite, a small coin, = Sp. mita, a payment, assessment, tribute), < MD. mijte, D. mijt, small coin, a mite; prob. akin to mite[1], from the same root, Goth. maitan, etc., cut: see mite[1].] 1. A small coin of any kind, of slight value; any very small sum of money. No coin seems to have been so called specifically.

William wigtli with-oute any more,
Greithed him as gaili as any gom thurt bene,
Of alle trie a-tir that to knigt longed,
So that non migt a-mend a mite worth, i wene.
William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 4543.

And though the number of sheep increase never so fast, yet the price falleth not one mite, because there be so few sellers. Sir T. More, Utopia (tr. by Robinson), i.

There came a certain poor widow, and she threw in [i. e. into the treasury] two mites [tr. Gr. λεπτόν: see lepton and minute], which make a farthing. Mark xii. 42.

We usually observe the same routine. I put down my mite first; then my young family enroll their contributions, . . . and then Mr. Pardiggle brings up the rear.
Dickens, Bleak House, viii.

2†. An English weight somewhat heavier than a grain troy.—3†. An old money of account, the twenty-fourth part of a penny.

4 mites is the aliquot part of a peny, viz. ⅙, for 6 times 4 is 24, and so many mites marchants assigne to 1 peny.
T. Hill, Arithmetic (1600), III. i.

4. Anything very small; a very little particle or quantity: also applied to persons.

"Now ich seo," saide Lyf, "that surgerye ne phisike May nat a myte availe to medlen a-gens Elde."
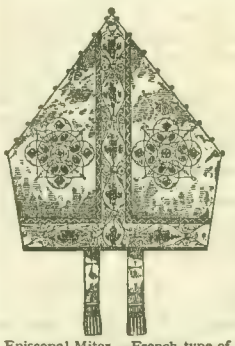
Piers Plowman (C), xxiii. 179.



I felt benevolence for her, and resolved some way or other to throw in my mite of courtesy, if not of service.
Sterne, Sentimental Journey, p. 19.

The White Sulphur waters, she said, had not done her a mite of good. C. D. Warner, Their Pilgrimage, p. 256.

mited (mī'ted), a. [< mite[1] + -ed[2].] Damaged or spoiled by insufficient salting, as cured fish. Perley.

Mitella (mi-tel'ä), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < L. mitella, dim. of mitra, a turban: see miter.] A genus of plants of the family Saxifragaceæ and the tribe Saxifrageæ, characterized by a one-celled ovary with parietal placentæ which are alternate with the stigmas, five petals which are three-cleft or pinnatifid, and a superior capsule without beaks. They are herbs, with long-petiolate heart-shaped lobed or crenate leaves, which have membranaceous stipules attached to the petioles, and an erect slender scape bearing an elongated raceme of small greenish flowers, which are often drooping. There are about 12 species, indigenous to the temperate parts of North America and eastern Asia. M. diphylla and M. nuda are the best-known. See bishop's-cap.

miter, mitre (mī'tėr), n. [Early mod. E. also myter, mytre; < ME. mitre, myter, mytir, mytre, < OF. mitre, F. mitre = Pr. Sp. Pg. mitra = It. mitra, OIt. metra, a miter, < L. mitra, < Gr. μίτρα, a belt, girdle, fillet, head-band, turban.] 1. A form of head-dress anciently worn by the inhabitants of Lydia, Phrygia, and other parts of Asia Minor.—2. A sacerdotal head-dress, as that worn by the ancient Jewish high priest, or that worn by a bishop. The Jewish miter was made of linen, and wrapped in folds about the head, like a turban. Before the fourteenth century the miter in the Christian church was low and simple; but now it consists of a coronet, surmounted by a lofty and deeply cleft cap. The privilege of wearing the miter in the Roman Catholic Church was a concession of the popes, and was formerly exercised by cardinals and the higher dignitaries. Bishops and abbots (if to be mitered) receive the miter from the consecrating bishop. Three kinds of miters are distinguished: (1) the precious miter, made of gold or silver plate and adorned with jewels, (2) the auriphrygiate miter, and (3) the simple miter of white silk or linen. The bishops of the Church of England wore miters as late as the coronation of George III., and some Anglican bishops occasionally wear them at the present day. See tiara, and cut under auriphrygia.

Episcopal Miter — French type of the 14th century.

Her golden cup she cast unto the ground,
And crowned mitre rudely threw asyde.
Spenser, F. Q., I. viii. 25.

The Cardinal [Wolsey] sent to the King, to lend him the Mitre and Pall, which he used to wear at any great Solemnity. Baker, Chronicles, p. 279.

His Miter on his head of cloth of siluer, with two long labels hanging downe behind his neck.
Coryat, Crudities, I. 37 (sig. D).

All the old known mitres still in existence have a white ground.
Rock, Church of our Fathers, ii. [109, note.

There, other trophies deck the truly brave, . . .
Such as on Hough's unsullied mitre shine.
Pope, Epil. to Satires, ii. 239.

3. A chimney-cap or -pot of terra-cotta, brick, stone, or metal, designed to exclude rain and wind from the flue, while allowing the smoke, etc., to escape; a cowl; hence, anything having a similar use.

Miter of glazed pottery; 14th century. From Semur-en-Auxois, France.

For, like as in a Limbeck th' heat of Fire
Raiseth a Vapour, which still mounting higher
To the Still's top; when th' odoriferous sweat Above the Miter can no further get,
It, softly thickning, falleth drop by drop.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 3.

4. In conch., a miter-shell.—5. In carp.: (a) A scribe or guide for making saw-cuts to form miter-joints. (b) A combined square and miter-edge or pattern. (c) Same as miter-joint.—6. A gusset in seamstresses' work, knitting, and the like.—Miter gearing, toothed gearing for the transmission of power and motion between two shafts whose axes intersect at right angles and which are to turn at the same number of revolutions. The two pitch-cones used as the basis for the design of the teeth on each wheel are the same or have their vertex angle 90°. The elements of each, therefore, make angles of 45° with the ★axis of the shaft, or have the miter angle.

miter, mitre (mī'tėr), v.; pret. and pp. mitered, mitred, ppr. mitering, mitring. [Early mod. E. also myter, mytre; < ME. mitren, mytren, < OF. mitrer, F. mitrer = Sp. Pg. mitrar = It. mitrare, Olt. metrare, < ML. mitrare, < mitra, a miter.]

I. trans. 1. To bestow a miter upon; raise to a rank to which the dignity of wearing a miter belongs, especially to episcopal rank.

More than al thy marchauns other thy mytrede bisshopes.
Piers Plowman (C), v. 193.

2. To ornament with a miter.

Your fangs you fasten'd on the mitred crown.
Dryden, Hind and Panther, i. 202.

3. In carp., to join with a miter-joint; make a miter-joint in. See miter-joint.—4. In needlework, to change the direction of, as a straight band, border, or the like, by cutting it at an abrupt angle, sacrificing a three-cornered piece, and bringing the cut edges together: a term derived from carpenter-work.—5. In bookbinding, to join perfectly, as lines intended to meet at right angles.—Cut and mitered string. See string.—Mitered abbey or monastery, an abbey or monastery presided over by a mitered abbot.

The abbess received a ring, which, however, was not bestowed on any abbot unless his house were a mitred abbey.
Rock, Church of our Fathers, ii. 194.

Mitered abbot, back, border, etc. See the nouns.

II. intrans. In arch., to meet in a miter-joint.

miter-block (mī'tėr-blok), n. In joinery, a block arranged for sawing pieces to an angle of 45°. E. H. Knight.

miter-board (mī'tėr-bōrd), n. A miter-box in which a piece is laid while the saw reciprocates between guides which cause it to make the kerf at the prescribed angle. E. H. Knight.

miter-box (mī'tėr-boks), n. In carp., a long narrow wooden box consisting of a bottom and two sides in which kerfs at an angle of 45° (or some other angle) are cut for the reception of a saw: used in cutting pieces of wood to form miter-joints. The piece of wood to be mitered is laid in the box, and the saw, being worked through the guide-cuts in the vertical sides, cuts the wood to the necessary angle. (See miter-joint.) Another form consists of a bed and a fence, against which the work rests, and an adjustable guide for the saw, so that it admits of cutting at any required angle. In printing the name is given to a square channel of wood or iron having diagonal cuts in the sides, in which a saw can move freely in cutting pieces of wood or brass of uniform angles.

miter-cut (mī'tėr-kut), n. In glass-manuf., a groove cut in the surface of plate-glass for ornamentation. The cross-section of the groove or cut is very nearly an equilateral triangle.

miter-dovetail (mī'tėr-duv″tāl), n. In joinery, a form of concealed dovetail presenting only a single joint-line, and that on the angle. E. H. Knight.

miter-drain (mī'tėr-drān), n. A drain laid within the metaling of roads, to convey the water to the side drains.

miter-flower (mī'tėr-flou″ėr), n. A plant of the genus Cyclamen.

miter-gage (mī'tėr-gāj), n. A gage for determining the angle of a miter-joint or bevel-joint for picture-frames, moldings, etc. E. H. Knight.

mitering-machine (mī'tėr-ing-ma-shēn″), n. 1. In carp. and joinery, a machine for sawing or cutting to a true angle of 45° the ends of pieces to be joined, in order that they may be united by a miter-joint, or for cutting the pieces to any desired angle to make a bevel-joint. One form of this machine consists of a table with a circular saw and adjustable guides or fences; another consists of a bed and guide, with two blades at right angles, for making a downward cut, fixed at an angle of 45° to the guide and actuated by a lever. The latter form is used for mitering picture-frames and small moldings.

2. In printing, a mechanism of iron and steel, designed to cut the ends of metal rules with exact bevels and secure true joints at any angle. This is done in some machines by a saw, in others by a file or chisel.

miter-iron (mī'tėr-ī″ėrn), n. A fagot for forging, composed of a group of bars of angular section wedged about a cylindrical bar within a hoop.

miter-jack (mī'tėr-jak), n. A simple form of miter-box or templet, consisting merely of a bed and a fence, against which the work rests. It is used for making miter-joints on small moldings.

miter-joint (mī'tėr-joint), n. A joint in which the plane of the abutting surfaces bisects the angle (properly 90°) formed by the abutting pieces. Each of the abutting pieces is dressed to an angle of 45°; when they are dressed to an angle greater or less than 45° they are generally termed bevel-joints. When the angle formed by the junction of two parts is 45°, and the plane of division bisects this angle, the joint is sometimes called a half miter-joint. Also called miter.

a a, Miter-joint.

miter-mushroom (mī'tėr-mush″röm), n. A kind of mushroom of the genus Helvella, H. crispa: so named from the shape of the pileus. It grows in woods, and is delicate eating.

miter-plane (mī'tėr-plān), n. In carp.: (a) A plane in which the bit is set at an acute angle with the longitudinal axis of the stock. The effect of this arrangement is to give the action of the plane the character of a draw-cut. (b) A plane which runs in a race in angular relation to fences or gages, usually adjustable, by which the stuff to be planed is held to the action of the tool.

miter-post (mī'tėr-pōst), n. Same as meeting-post.

miter-shaped (mī'tėr-shāpt), a. Having the shape of a miter: said especially of a form of head-dress worn by women in the middle of the fifteenth century.

miter-shell (mī'tėr-shel), n. The turreted shell of a mollusk of the genus Mitra or family Mitridæ; a tiara-shell. See cut under Mitra.

miter-sill (mī'tėr-sil), n. A raised step against which the foot of a canal-lock gate shuts on the floor of a lock-bay. E. H. Knight.

miter-square (mī'tėr-skwār), n. In carp., an immovable bevel for striking upon a piece of stuff an angle of 45°.

miter-valve (mī'tėr-valv), n. A valve of which the lid or plug is the frustum of a cone, the face of the seat being inclined at an angle of 45° to ★the axis of the valve.

miter-wheel (mī'tėr-hwēl), n. 1. In mech., a particular kind of bevel-wheel, the bevel being limited to an angle of 45°, and the teeth of the wheel meshing with the teeth of another of the same bevel and diameter. The shafts of the wheels are at right angles with each other; and rotary motion in any plane is, by this mechanism, translated, without change of velocity, into motion in another plane at right angles with the first. Miter-wheels are much used in millwork. See bevel-wheel and bevel-gear.

Miter-wheels.

2. In glass-cutting, a wheel used for cutting a groove of triangular section.

miterwort (mī'tėr-wėrt), n. A name common to all plants of the genus Mitella.—False miterwort. See coolwort and Tiarella.

mithe†, v. t. [ME. mithen, < AS. mīthan (= OS. mīthan = OFries. for-mītha = OHG. mīdan, MHG. mīden, G. meiden), avoid, conceal, refrain from, forbear, intr. lie concealed: see miss[1].] To avoid; conceal.

His sorwe he couthe ful wel mithe.
Havelok, l. 948.

mither (mi♯H'ėr), n. A Scotch form of mother[1].

mithic†, a. An obsolete spelling of mythic.

Mithra, n. See Mithras.

Mithradatic (mith-ra-dat'ik), a. Same as Mithridatic, 1.

Mithræum (mith-rē'um), n. [NL., < L. Mithras, Mithras: see Mithras.] In Rom. antiq., a shrine or sanctuary of Mithras: usually an underground cell, grotto, or crypt in which the secret mysteries of Mithras were celebrated.

In the Mithræum there were—there are still, because we have saved the place from destruction, and added it to the curiosities of Rome—the remnant of the seven torches . . . which were kept burning before the image of Mithras Tauroktonos.
Lanciani, Anc. Rome in the Light of Mod. Discov., p. 192.

Mithraic (mith-rā'ik), a. [< Mithras + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the ancient Persian and late Roman god Mithras.

Two statues of Mithraic torch-bearers.
C. O. Müller, Manual of Archæol. (trans.), § 206.

The Mithraic doctrines appear to have comprised all the prominent features of the Magian or Chaldean system, and we need not be surprised, therefore, that they are represented as embracing magical, occult, and thaumaturgical science.
A. Wilder, in Knight's Anc. Art and Myth. (1876), p. xix.

Mithraicism (mith-rā'i-sizm), n. [< Mithraic + -ism.] Same as Mithraism.

Mithraicism, with explanations of its alliance with Occidental Christianity.
Pop. Sci. Mo., Literary Notices, XXXII. 560.

Mithraism (mith'ra-izm), n. [< Mithras + -ism.] The worship of Mithras.

The religion of Mithra . . . played an important part in the thought of the early centuries of the Christian era, yet little is known of Mithraism at the present time.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXIII. 283.

Mithraist (mith'ra-ist), n. [< Mithras + -ist.] A worshiper of Mithras.

This fact suggests a question . . . whether the Christians borrowed from the Mithraists, or the Mithraists from the Christians, or whether the coincidences are casual.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXIII. 283.

Mithraize (mith'ra-īz), v. i.; pret. and pp. Mithraized, ppr. Mithraizing. [< Mithras + -ize.] To teach, profess, or practise Mithraic doctrines; observe the rites of Mithras.

Mithras, Mithra (mith'ras, mith'rä), n. [L. Mithras, Mithres, < Gr. Μίθρας, < OPers. Mitra = Skt. Mitra, lit. 'friend.'] 1. A deity of the ancient Persians, the god of light or of the sun, who came at last to be regarded as the ruler of both the material and the spiritual universe, and was worshiped with an elaborate ritual, with accompaniment of ceremonial mysteries. In this form his worship was adopted by the Romans under the early empire, and enjoyed great popularity. Representations of Mithras are common in Roman art, usually showing him as a youth in Oriental dress performing the mystic sacrifice of a bull. Sacred caves or grottos were the regular seats of his worship.

They call upon no peculiar name of God, but only Mythra; in the which word they all agree together in one nature of the divine Majesty, whatsoever it be.
Sir T. More, Utopia (tr. by Robinson), ii. 11.

The sacred grotto of Mithras, in the Campus Martius [Rome], . . . in the plot of ground which is now occupied by the Marignoli palace.
Lanciani, Anc. Rome in the Light of Mod. Discov., p. 166.

2. A genus of South American lycænid butterflies. Hübner, 1816.—3. A genus of spiders. Koch, 1835.

mithridate† (mith'ri-dāt), n. [Also methridate, and improp. mithradite; < OF. mithridat, methridat, F. mithridate = Sp. It. mitridato = Pg. mithridato, < ML. mithridatum for LL. mithridatium, an antidote, neut. of L. Mithridatius, Mithridateus, of Mithridates, < Mithridates, < Gr. Μιθραδάτης, Μιθριδάτης, Mithridates VI., King of Pontus (died about 63 B. C.), who fortified himself against poisons by taking antidotes; a name of Pers. origin: cf. Mithras.] In old phar., one of various compositions of many ingredients in the form of electuaries, supposed to serve either as an antidote or as a preservative against poison.

I feel me ill; give me some mithridate;
Some mithridate and oil, good sister, fetch me.
B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, iv. 6.

Wine, an it be thy will! strong lusty wine!
Well, fools may talk of mithridate, cordials, and elixirs;
But from my youth this was my only physic.
Fletcher (and another), Sea Voyage, v. 2.

This is a course that will . . . alter slander into piety, . . . that the viper's flesh may become mithridate.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 753.

Mithridate mustard, a kind of penny-cress. See pepperwort.

Mithridatic (mith-ri-dat'ik), a. [= F. mithridatique = Pg. mithridatico, < L. Mithridaticus, pertaining to Mithridates, < Mithridates, Mithridates: see mithridate.] 1. Of or pertaining to Mithridates, specifically to Mithridates VI. of Pontus (died about 63 B. C.): as, the Mithridatic wars. Also Mithradatic.—2†. [l. c.] Pertaining to or of the nature of mithridate.

mithridatum†, n. [Improp. methridatum (after methridate); < ML. mithridatum for LL. mithridatium, an antidote: see mithridate.] Same as mithridate.

But what brave spirit could be content to sit in his shop, with a flappet of wood before him, . . . selling Mithridatum and dragons-water to visited houses [during the plague]? Beau. and Fl., Knight of Burning Pestle, i. 3.

mitigable (mit'i-ga-bl), a. [< LL. mitigabilis* (in adv. mitigabiliter), < mitigare, mitigate: see mitigate.] Capable of being mitigated.

The vigour of that ceremonious law was mitigable.
Barrow, Works, II. xv.

mitigant (mit'i-gant), a. [= F. mitigant = Sp. It. mitigante, < L. mitigan(t-)s, ppr. of mitigare, mitigate: see mitigate.] Mitigating; lenitive; soothing; alleviating. Bailey, 1727.

mitigate (mit'i-gāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. mitigated, ppr. mitigating. [< L. mitigatus, pp. of mitigare (> It. mitigare = Sp. Pg. mitigar = F. mitiger), make mild, gentle, soft, or tender, < mitis, mild, etc., + agere, make: see agent.] 1. To make milder or more tolerable; reduce in amount or degree, as something objectionable, reprehensible, distressing, harmful, etc.; moderate; alleviate; assuage.

And dieted with fasting every day,
The swelling of his woundes to mitigate.
Spenser, F. Q., I. x. 26.

To mitigate the scorn he gives his uncle,
He prettily and aptly taunts himself.
Shak., Rich. III., iii. 1. 133.

I esteem it the office of a physician not only to restore health, but to mitigate pain and dolours.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii. 196.

I may mitigate their doom
On me derived. Milton, P. L., x. 76.

Her benevolent heart sought every means to mitigate the authorized severities of the law.
Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., ii. 16.

2. To soften; mollify; make mild and accessible. [Rare.]

Where the King took displeasure, she would mitigate and appease his mind.
Sir T. More, Int. to Utopia, p. lxxxv.

Turning to the master of the Temple, [he] began with gentle wordes to mittigate him. Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 35.

Carlyle, French Rev., I. vii. 9.

mixtilineal (miks-ti-lin'ē-al), a. [< L. mixtus, pp. of miscere, mix, + linea, line, + -al.] Containing or consisting of a mixture of lines, right and curved.

mixtilinear (miks-ti-lin'ē-ăr), a. Same as ★mixtilineal.

mixtion (miks'chon), n. [Formerly mistion; < OF. mistion, F. mixtion = Sp. mistion, mixtión = Pg. mixtão = It. mistione, < L. mixtio(n-), mistio(n-), a mixing, mixture, < miscere, pp. mixtus, mistus, mix: see mix[1].] †1. Mixture; promiscuous commingling.

Others, perceiving this rule to fall short, have pieced it out by the mixtion of vacuity among bodies, believing it is that which makes one rarer than another.
Sir K. Digby, Nature of Bodies.

2. Among French artists, a mixture of amber, mastic, and asphaltum used as a medium or mordant for affixing leaf-gold to wood or distemper pictures.

★mixture (miks'tūr), n. [< ME. mixture, < OF. mixture, misture, F. mixture = Sp. mistura, mixtura = Pg. mistura = It. mistura, < L. mixtura, mistura, a mixing, < miscere, pp. mixtus, mistus, mix: see mix[1].] 1. The act of mixing, or the state of being mixed.

The mixture of those things by speech which by nature are divided is the mother of all error.
Hooker, Eccles. Polity, iii. 3.

2. That which results from mixing; a mixed mass, body, or assemblage; a compound or combination of different ingredients, parts, or principles; specifically, in phar., a preparation in which insoluble substances are suspended in watery fluids by means of gum arabic, sugar, the yolk of eggs, or other viscid matter. When the suspended substance is of an oleaginous nature, the mixture is properly called an emulsion. U. S. Dispensatory.

Whanne ge wole drawe the toon fro that othir putte al that mixture into a strong watir maad of vitriol and of salpetre. Book of Quinte Essence (ed. Furnivall), p. 9.

What if this mixture do not work at all?
Shak., R. and J., iv. 3. 21.

Society, in the modern acceptation of a miscellaneous mixture, which equalizes men even in their inequality, . . . opened that wider stage which a growing metropolis only could exhibit. I. D'Israeli, Amen. of Lit., II. 351.

3. Admixture; something mingled or added.

The wine of the wrath of God, which is poured out without mixture into the cup of his indignation. Rev. xiv. 10.

His acts were some virtuous, some politick, some just, some pious; and yet all these not without some mixture of Vice. Baker, Chronicles, p. 11.

There's no great Wit without some Mixture of Madness, so saith the Philosopher. Howell, Letters, I. v. 16.

4. In chem., a blending of several ingredients without chemical alteration of the substances, each of which still retains its own nature and properties: distinguished from combination, in which the substances unite by chemical attraction, lose their distinct properties, and form a compound differing in its properties from any of the ingredients.—5. In organ-building, a flue-stop having two or more pipes to each digital, the pipes being so tuned as to give certain sets of the shriller harmonics of the fundamental tone of the digital; a compound stop. The stop is known as "of two ranks," "of three ranks," etc., according to the number of pipes to a digital. The harmonics chosen for reinforcement vary with the pitch of the fundamental tone, a low tone being provided with higher harmonics than a high one. The points in the compass where changes from one set of harmonics to another take place are called breaks. The harmonics usually chosen are those that lie at the intervals of fifths or octaves from the fundamental tone, rarely at those of thirds or sevenths. Mixtures serve two purposes: to enrich the total effect of heavy combinations by reinforcing the brilliant overtones of the harmony, and to emphasize the upper tones of heavy chords by reinforcing their nearer harmonics. They are never properly used except in combination with foundation-stops. Mixtures are variously named, as cornet, furniture, etc.

6. A cloth of variegated or mottled coloring, usually of sober tints.—7. In printing, typesetting that calls for the use of three or more distinct faces or faces and bodies of type. [Eng.]—8. Same as krasis.—Brown mixture. See brown.—Deflagrating mixtures. See deflagrate.—French mixture. See French.—Griffith's mixture, a mixture containing iron carbonate; the mistura ferri composita of the United States Pharmacopœia.—Heather mixture. Same as heather[3].—Isomorphous mixture. See isomorphous group, under isomorphous.—Mechanical mixture. See chemical combination, under chemical.—Mixture of colors. See color.—Oxford mixture, woolen cloth of a very dark gray color. Also called Oxford gray, pepper-and-salt, and thunder-and-lightning.—Prince's mixture, a dark kind of snuff scented with attar of roses.—Rule of mixtures. Same as alligation, 2.

=Syn. 2. Mixture, Miscellany, Medley, Farrago, Hotchpotch, Jumble; variety, diversity. Mixture is a general term denoting a compound of two or more ingredients, more often, but not necessarily, congruous. Miscellany is a collection of things not closely connected, but brought together by rational design: "A miscellany has the diversity without the incongruity of a medley." (C. J. Smith, Syn. Disc., p. 564.) Specifically, a miscellany is a collection of independent literary pieces, the unity lying only in their general character. A medley is a mixture or collection of things distinctly incongruous: the word has the specific sense of a song or tune made up of scraps of other songs or tunes ingeniously and amusingly fitted together. Farrago emphasizes the confusion or indiscriminateness of the mixture or collection: it is applied chiefly to printed or spoken discourse. Hotchpotch is a still more energetic expression of the confusion of the collection, the idea being drawn from the boiling together of shreds of all sorts of food. Jumble implies the idea of a heap turned over and over till everything is hopelessly mixed. The figurative uses correspond essentially to the literal.

Pure from passion's mixture rude, Ever to base earth allied. Lowell, Comm. Ode.

The world lies no longer a dull miscellany and lumber-room, but has form and order. Emerson, Misc., p. 94.

The sun was in the west when we left Jellalabad with its strange medley of associations, and strolled back through the gardens to the camp.
Arch. Forbes, Souvenirs of some Continents, p. 202.

I've heard, I confess, with no little surprise
English history call'd a farrago of lies.
Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, II. 338.

A mash'd heap, a hotchpotch of the slain.
Dryden, tr. of Juvenal's Satires, iii. 415.

The Alhambra is a jumble of buildings, with irregular tiled roofs, and absolutely plain, rough, uncolored walls on the exterior. C. D. Warner, Roundabout Journey, p. 247.

Mniotilta (nī-ō-til'tă), n. [NL., appar. < Gr. μνίον, moss, + τιλτός, verbal adj. of τίλλειν, pull or pull out, as hair.] A genus of American creeping warblers of the family Sylvicolidæ or Mniotiltidæ, founded by Vieillot in 1816. There is only one species, M. varia, the common black-and-white creeper of the United States. The bill and feet are black. The entire plumage is streaked and spotted with black and white. This bird abounds in woodland, and has the habits of a creeper rather than of a warbler. The nest, placed on the ground or on a stump or log, is built of moss, bark-strips, grass, leaves, hair, etc.; the eggs are 4 or 5 in number and white in color, profusely speckled with reddish.

Black-and-white Creeper (Mniotilta varia).

Mniotilteæ (nī-ō-til′tē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Mniotilta + -eæ.] A restricted section of Sylvicolidæ; the creeping warblers proper of the genera Mniotilta, Parula, and Protonotaria. S. F. Baird, 1858.

Mniotiltidæ (nī-ō-til′ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Mniotilta + -idæ.] An extensive family of oscine passerine birds, named from the genus Mniotilta, formerly oftener called Sylvicolidæ; the American warblers. They have 9 primaries, 12 rectrices, scutellate tarsi, and a moderate bill usually notched and furnished with rictal vibrissæ. There are many genera and upward of 100 species, all confined to America. They are small and usually prettily colored birds of the woodland, all insectivorous and in temperate and cold regions migratory. They abound in species and individuals in eastern portions of the United States, where they form a very characteristic feature of the avifauna. Leading genera in that country are Dendrœca, Mniotilta, Parula (or Compsothlypis), Protonotaria, Helmintherus, Helminthophila, Geothlypis, Icteria, Myiodioctes, and Setophaga. The family is usually divided into 3 subfamilies: Mniotiltinæ (or Sylvicolinæ), Icteriinæ (or Geothlypinæ), and Setophaginæ, or the wood-warblers, ground-warblers, and fly-catching warblers respectively. Also called Dendrœcidæ.

mo, moe[1] (mō), a. and adv. [= Sc. mae, < ME. mo, ma, < AS. mā (= OFries. mā = MHG. mē), more (in number), a reduced compar. form connected with the adj. māra, more: see more[1].] More. The form mo is often used by Shakspere, Spenser, etc., and sometimes archaically by more recent writers; but the mo which is common in the vulgar speech of the southern United States is a negro pronunciation of more (properly written mo').

His Ave Maria he lerid hym alswa,
And other prayers many ma.
MS. Lincoln A. i. 17, f. 142. (Halliwell.)

There were wont to ben 5 Soudans: but now there is no mo but he of Egypt. Mandeville, Travels, p. 36.

I sawe Calliope with Muses moe.
Spenser, Shep. Cal., June.

The children of Israel are mo and mightier than we.
Ex. i. 9 (Oxf., 1717). (Nares.)

★ Mo. In chem., the symbol for molybdenum.

moa (mō′ä), n. [Maori.] A gigantic extinct bird of the family Dinornithidæ. See cut under Dinornis.

Moabite (mō′a-bīt), n. and a. [< LL. Moabites, < Gr. Μωαβίτης, < Μωάβ, also Μώαβος (> LL. Moab), < Heb. Mō'ābh, Moab.] I. n. One of a tribe of people descended from Moab, one of the sons of Lot (Gen. xix. 36, 37), anciently inhabiting the mountainous region lying to the east of the Dead Sea and of the lower part of the river Jordan.

II. a. Pertaining to Moab or the Moabites. —Moabite stone, a slab of black basalt bearing an inscription of thirty-four lines in Hebrew-Phenician characters, the oldest monument of the Semitic alphabet. It was found in 1868 at the ancient Dibon of Moab. Before it could be removed it was broken in many pieces, through the jealousies of Arab tribes, but a squeeze of the inscription had been previously taken, and the chief fragments are now in the Louvre Museum. The stone is the most important surviving relic of Moabite civilization, and is believed to date from about 900 B. C. The inscription records the victories of King Mesha over the Israelites.

Moabitess (mō′a-bī-tes), n. [′ Moabite + -ess.] A female Moabite. Ruth i. 22.

S. Ward, Sermons, p. 100. (Davies.)

mock-guest† (mok'gest), n. [< mock[1], v., + obj. guest.] One who seems to offer hospitality, but only in empty show, like the Barmecide in the Arabian Nights. Davies.

Those mock-guests are guilty in tempting others to tempt them. Fuller, Holy State, I. i. 7.

mock-heroic (mok'hē-rō'ik), a. Counterfeiting or burlesquing the heroic style, character, or bearing: as, a mock-heroic poem; a mock-heroic swagger.

★mocking-bird (mok'ing-bėrd), n. An oscine passerine bird of the subfamily Mimineæ and restricted genus Mimus; a mock-bird or mocker. The best-known species is M. polyglottus, which abounds in the southerly parts of the United States: it is the most famous songster of America, and is much prized as a cage-

Mocking-bird (Mimus polyglottus).

bird. Its proper song is of remarkable compass and variety, and besides this the bird has a wonderful range, being able to imitate almost any voice or even mere noises. This vocalization is confined to the male. The bird is about 10 inches long and 14 in extent of wings. It is ashy gray above, soiled-white below; the bill and feet are black, and the wing- and tail-feathers in part pure white. The extent of this white on the wings and tail distinguishes the sexes, being greatest in the male. The nest is placed in trees and bushes, and is bulky and inartistic, built of twigs, grass, leaves, etc. The eggs are bluish-green, heavily freckled with various brownish shades; they are 4 to 6 in number, measuring on an average 1 inch by 0.75 inch. See Mimineæ.

mockingly (mok'ing-li), adv. In a mocking or jeering manner; with ridicule, derision, or contempt; so as to disappoint, deceive, or cheat.

"Let 's meete," quoth Eccho, mockingly.
Warner, Albion's England, ix. 45.

mock-velvet (mok'vel'vet), n. A fabric made in imitation of velvet; especially, such a fabric in common use in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, supposed to be the same as moccado.

Hee weares his apparell much after the fashion; his means will not suffer him to come too nigh; they afford him mock-velvet, or satinisco.
Sir T. Overbury, Characters, M 6 b. (Nares.) mocmain (mok'mān), n. [Appar. of E. Ind. or Chin. origin; perhaps < Chin. muh (= Jap. mokü), tree, + mien (= Jap. men), cotton.] A white shining fiber of great lightness and elasticity, produced by the silk-cotton tree, Bombax Ceiba.—Mocmain truss, a truss stuffed with this fiber.

moco (mō'kō), n. [Tupi mocó.] A Brazilian rodent of the family Caviidæ; the rock-cavy, Cavia rupestris.

mocuddum (mō-kud'um), n. [Also mokuddum, mocuddim, prop. mukaddam, < Ar. muqaddam, a chief, leader; as adj., preceding; < Ar. qawada, lead.] In India, a head man. Specifically—(a) The head man of a village, responsible for the collection of the revenue. (b) The head man of a gang of laborers or body of peons. Yule and Burnell.

mod†, n. A Middle English form of mood[1].

mod. An abbreviation (a) of modern; (b) in ★music, of moderato.

modal (mō'dal), a. and n. [= F. Sp. Pg. modal = It. modale, < ML. modalis, pertaining to a mode, < L. modus, mode: see mode[1], n.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to or affected by a mode; relating to the mode or manner, and not to the substance.

When we speak of faculties of the soul, we assert not with the schools their real distinction from it, but only a modal diversity. Glanville, Vanity of Dogmatizing, iii.

Specifically—2. Of or pertaining to a grammatical mode.

Other verb-phrases, of a modal meaning, are made with the auxiliary verbs may, can, must, and ought.
Whitney, Essentials of Eng. Grammar, ¶ 291.

All those adjectives which have a modal secondary force are future. Amer. Jour. Philol., X. 40.

Modal abstraction, the fixing of the attention upon one particular mode of the object of imagination, to the neglect of the others: opposed to partial abstraction, by which, for example, we may think of the head of an animal without thinking of the rest of the body.—Modal categorical. See categorical.—Modal composition†, the composition of an ens with one of those modes which are in their own nature distinguished from the ens.—Modal distinction†, a distinction by which one and the same thing is distinguished from itself by its possession of diverse modes, as the distinction of Philip drunk from Philip sober: a formalistic phrase.—Modal enunciation. See enunciation.—Modal identity†, either the absence of modal distinction, or the identity of a mode of things which may be really distinct.—Modal proposition, a proposition in which the predicate is affirmed of the subject under some qualification: but the term is almost always confined to propositions in which some fact is said to be possible, contingent, necessary, or impossible.—Modal syllogism, a syllogism one of whose premises is a modal proposition.

II. n. A modal proposition.

Their characteristic property as modals belongs to form rather than to matter; and Aristotle ought not to be considered as unphilosophical for introducing them into the Organon. Grote, Aristotle, iv.

Conjunct modal. See conjunct.—Disjunct modal. See disjunct.

modalism (mō'dal-izm), n. [< modal + -ism.] In theol., the doctrine, adopted by Sabellius in the third century, that the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit are different manifestations of one and the same person.

The orthodox doctrine of the Trinity stands between tritheism and modalism, now leaning to the one, now to the other, when either the tripersonality or the unity is emphasized. P. Schaff, Christ and Christianity, p. 68.

modalist (mō'dal-ist), n. [< modal + -ist.] In theol., one who holds or professes modalism.

modalistic (mō-da-lis'tik), a. [< modalist + -ic.] In theol., of or pertaining to modalism.

The presbyter Hippolytus was successful in convincing the leaders of that church that the Modalistic doctrine, taken in its strictness, was contrary to scripture.
Harnack, Encyc. Brit., XXI. 127.

★modality (mō-dal'i-ti), n.; pl. modalities (-tiz). [= F. modalité = Pg. modalidade = It. modalità, < ML. modalita(t-)s, < modalis, modal: see modal.] 1. The fact of being a mode.—2. A determination of an accident; a mode.

These excellencies are of more real and eternal worth than the angelical manner of moving so in an instant, and those other forms and modalities of their knowledge and volition. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 194.

3. Mode in the logical sense; that wherein problematical, assertoric, and apodictic judgments are distinguished.

Lastly, under the head of Modality, we have seen that all phenomena, as objects, are in themselves contingent, or only hypothetically necessary, i. e. necessary on the presupposition of the existence of something else.
E. Caird, Philos. of Kant, p. 564.

Just as the adjectives which contain the modal force of possibility can lose this modality, so also certain adjectives can assume the same, although the modality was not originally in them. Amer. Jour. Philol., X. 44.

4. In civil law, the quality of being limited as to time or place of performance, or, more loosely, of being suspended by a condition: said of a promise.—5†. Same as modalism.

To object that the faith in the Holy Trinity obliges us to as greate a difficulty as the Pontifician modalitie is very trifling, since that is onely matter of beliefe indefinite. We are not required to explaine the manner of the mysterie. Evelyn, To Rev. Father Patrick.

Adverbial modality. See adverbial.—Categories of modality. See category, 1.

modally (mō'dal-i), adv. In a modal manner; in a manner or relation expressing or indicating a mode or form; as regards mode or manner.

moddert, n. Same as mauther.

mode[1] (mōd), n. [Also, in grammar, logic, and ★music, mood; also, as mere L., modus; in ME. moede (def. 8), < OF. moed*, meuf, later mode, F. mode, manner, way, mode, style, fashion, = Sp. Pg. It. modo, manner, mode (also Sp. Pg. It. moda, f., fashion, < F.) (cf. D. mode = G. mode = Sw. mod = Dan. mode, style, fashion, < F.; G. Sw. Dan. modus, in grammar, < L.), < L. modus, measure, due measure, rhythm, melody, etc., manner, way, mode, mode in grammar, etc.; akin to E. mete[1]. The form mood, as used, along with mode, in grammar, music, and logic, is prob. due in part to some confusion with mood[1], as if 'an attitude of mind.'] 1. A manner of acting or doing; way of performing or effecting anything; method; way.

A table richly spread in regal mode.
Milton, P. R., ii. 340

What modes of sight between each wide extreme!
Pope, Essay on Man, i. 211.

Ring in the nobler modes of life,
With sweeter manners, purer laws.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, cvi.

2. Customary manner; prevailing style; fashion.

It was grown a Mode to be vicious, and they had rather be damned than be out of the fashion.
Stillingfleet, Sermons, I. xii.

To White Hall, and in the garden spoke to my Lord Sandwich, who is in his gold-buttoned suit, as the mode is, and looks nobly. Pepys, Diary, II. 8.

If after this we look on the people of mode in the country, we find in them the manners of the last age.
Addison, Country Manners.

3. In gram., the designation, by the form of the verb, of the manner of our conception of an event or fact, whether as certain, contingent, possible, desirable, or the like. The modes of the English verb are the indicative, subjunctive, and imperative; and other verbal phrases are usually called by the name of modes, as potential, conditional, and so on. See these terms. Also commonly, but less properly, mood.

4. The natural disposition or the manner of existence or action of anything; a form: as, heat is a mode of motion; reflection is a mode of consciousness.

There is something in things which neither is the thing itself, nor another thing, nor yet nothing, but a certain medium betwixt them both. And this used to be called a mode: for example, A degree of quality is not quality, nor yet is it wholly nothing, but a mode.
Burgersdicius, tr. by a Gentleman.

A mode is the manner of existence of a thing. Take, for example, a piece of wax. The wax may be round or square or of any other definite figure; it may also be solid or fluid. Its existence in any of these modes is not essential; it may change from one to another without any substantial alteration. As the mode cannot exist without a substance, we can accord to it only a secondary or precarious existence in relation to the substance, to which we accord the privilege of existing by itself, per se existere; but though the substance be not astricted to any particular mode of existence, we must not suppose that it can exist, or at least be conceived by us to exist, in none. All modes are therefore variable states; and though some mode is necessary for the existence of a thing, any individual mode is accidental. Sir W. Hamilton, Metaph., viii.

I am . . . assured that those modes of consciousness which I call perceptions and imaginations, in as far only as they are modes of consciousness, exist in me.
Descartes, Meditations (tr. by Veitch), iii.

Where the substantiality of God, as the "highest monad," is insisted on, the finite monads become mere modes of his existence. E. Caird, Philos. of Kant, p. 82.

That mode or process of the Moral Faculty which we call Conscience. H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 341.

5. A combination of ideas. See the quotations.

Modes I call such complex ideas, which, however compounded, contain not in them the supposition of subsisting by themselves, but are considered as dependencies on or affections of substances.
Locke, Human Understanding, II. xii. 14.

There are some [modes] which are only variations or different combinations of the same simple idea, . . . as a dozen, or score: which are nothing but the ideas of so many distinct units added together: and these I call simple modes, as being contained within the bounds of one simple idea. Locke, Human Understanding, II. xii. 5.

Combinations of simple ideas of different kinds I have called "mixed modes."
Locke, Human Understanding, II. xii. 5.

6. In logic: (a) A modification or determination of a proposition with reference to possibility and necessity. (b) A variety of syllogism. See mood[2], the more usual but less proper form.

Tindall would be fayne wit in what figure it is made; he shal finde in the first figure and in the third mode.
Sir T. More, Works, p. 504.

(c) The consignificate of a part of speech. (d) An accidental determination.—7. In music: (a) A species or form of scale; a method of dividing the interval of the octave for melodic purposes; an arrangement of tones within an octave at certain fixed intervals from each other. Three great systems of modes are to be distinguished—the ancient Greek, the Gregorian, medieval, or ecclesiastical, and the modern. These three were successively derived from each other, but with noteworthy changes of both principle and nomenclature. (1) In the Greek system each mode consisted of two tetrachords (two whole steps and one half-step in each) plus one whole step (the diazeuctic tone). The nature and the name of the mode varied according to the tetrachord used as a basis and according to the position of the diazeuctic tone, or, in other words, according to the relative order of the whole steps and half-steps. When the diazeuctic tone lay between the two component tetrachords, the mode was named simply from the tetrachord used—the mode containing Dorian tetrachords was called Dorian or Doric, etc.; but when it lay below or above both of them, the prefixes hypo- and hyper- respectively were added, as Hypophrygian, Hyperlydian, etc. Below is a table of the nine original modes, reckoned upward, the whole steps being indicated by —, the half-steps by ⌣, the constituent tetrachords by ⁀, and the diazeuctic tone by +:

I. Dorian, * ⌣ * — * — * + * ⌣ * — * — *
II. Phrygian, * — * ⌣ * — * + * — * ⌣ * — *
III. Lydian, * — * — * ⌣ * + * — * — * ⌣ *
IV. Hypodorian, or Æolian, * + * — * ⌣ * — * ⌣ * — * — *
V. Hypophrygian, Ionian, or Iastian, * + * — * ⌣ * — * — * ⌣ * — *
VI. Hypolydian, * + * — * — * ⌣ * — * — * ⌣ *
VII. Hyperdorian, or Mixolydian, * ⌣ * — * — * ⌣ * — * — * + * — *
VIII. Hyperphrygian, or Locrian, * — * ⌣ * — * — * ⌣ * — * + * — *
IX. Hyperlydian, * — * — * ⌣ * — * — * ⌣ * + * — *

These modes were embodied in scales of about two octaves, sometimes called transposing scales, which were more or less susceptible of transposition. By the later theorists fifteen such scales were recognized, each derived from one of the foregoing modes, and beginning at a different pitch, each a half-step higher than the preceding. These scales, though not always differing from each other in mode, but only in relative pitch, were also called modes, and were named like the modes themselves. Assuming the lowest tone of the lowest scale to be A, the series of later scales or "modes" would be:

Hypodorian, embodying mode IV. above, A.
Hypoionian, Hypoiastian, or lower Hypophrygian (mode V.), B♭.
Hypophrygian (mode V.), B.
Hypoœolian, or lower Hypolydian (mode VI.), C.
Hypolydian (mode VI.), C♯.
Dorian (mode I.), D.
Ionian, Iastian, or lower Phrygian (mode II.), E♭.
Phrygian (mode II.), E.
Æolian, or lower Lydian (mode III.), F.
Lydian (mode III.), F♯.
Hyperdorian, or Mixolydian (mode VII.), G.
Hyperionian, Hyperiastian, or higher Mixolydian (mode VII.), G♯.
Hyperphrygian, or Hypermixolydian (mode VIII.), A.
Hyperæolian, or lower Hyperlydian (mode IX.), B♭.
Hyperlydian (mode IX.), B.

The fact that the term mode has been applied from very early times both to the ideal octave-forms, or true modes, and to the practical scales or tonalities based upon them has led to great confusion. Furthermore, the extant data of the subject are fragmentary and obscure, so that authorities differ widely. (The summary here given is taken chiefly from Alfred Richter.) The esthetic and moral value of the different modes was much discussed by the Greeks, and melodies were written in one or other of the modes according to the sentiment intended to be expressed. (2) The Gregorian, medieval, or ecclesiastical system was originally intended partly to follow the ancient system. Several of the old modes were retained, but subsequently received curiously transposed names. The system was initiated by Ambrose, Bishop of Milan, in the latter part of the fourth century, perfected by Gregory the Great about 600, and still further extended between the eleventh and sixteenth centuries. It exercised a deep influence upon the beginnings of modern music, and is still in use in the Roman Catholic Church. The ecclesiastical modes differ from each other both in the relative position of their "finals" or key-notes and in the order of their whole steps and half-steps. They are authentic when the final is the lowest tone of the ambitus or compass, and plagal when it is the fourth tone from the bottom. Four authentic modes were established by Ambrose, the four corresponding plagal modes were added by Gregory, and six others were subsequently appended, making fourteen in all. In each mode certain tones are regarded as specially important—the final, on which every melody must end, and which is nearly equivalent to the modern key-note; the dominant, or principal reciting-note; and the mediant and participant, on which phrases (other than the first and last) may begin and end: these are generically called modulations. All the modes are susceptible of transposition. Assuming the final of the first mode to be A, the full series is as follows (finals are marked F, dominants D, and mediants M):

I. Dorian (authentic) ..... F M D

(3) In the modern system only two of the historic modes are retained—the major, equivalent to the Greek Lydian and the medieval Ionian, and the minor (in its full form), equivalent to the Greek and medieval Æolian. These modes differ from each other in the order of their whole steps and half-steps, as follows:

Major ..... * — * — * ⌣ * — * — * — *⌣ *
Minor (full or descending) * — * ⌣ * — * — * ⌣ * — *— * ("instrumental") .. * — * ⌣ * — * — * ⌣ * —⌣*⌣ * (ascending) ..... * — * ⌣ * — * — * — * — *⌣ *

See major, minor, and scale. (b) In medieval music, a term by which the relative time-value or rhythmic relation of notes was indicated. Two kinds of modes were recognized: the great, fixing the relation between the notes called "large" and "long," and the less, fixing that between those called "long" and "breve"; and each of these kinds might also be perfect, making the longer note equal to three of the shorter, or imperfect, making it equal to two of the shorter.

8†. Measure; melody; harmony.

Musyce, a damysel of oure hows that syngeth now lyhtere moedes or probasyons, now hevyere.
Chaucer, Boëthius, ii. prose 1.

9. In lace-making: (a) An unusual decorative stitch or fashion, characteristic of the pattern of any special sort of lace; especially, a small piece of such decorative work inserted in the pattern of lace. Hence, because such decorative insertions are more open than the rest of the pattern, mode is used as equivalent to jour.

The use of meshed grounds extended [1650–1720], and grounds composed entirely of varieties of modes were made.
Encyc. Brit., XIV. 185.

(b) The filling of openwork meshes or the like between the solid parts of the pattern.—10. A garment for women's wear, apparently a mantle with a hood, worn in England in the eighteenth century.

Certain wardrobes of the third story were ransacked, and their contents, in the shape of brocaded and hooped petticoats, satin sacques, black modes, lace lappets, etc., were brought down in armfuls by the Abigails.
Charlotte Brontë, Jane Eyre, xviii.

Accidental mode. See substantial mode.—Adverbial mode, that sort of modification of a proposition that may be effected by the addition of such adverbs as possibly and necessarily.—All the mode, all the fashion; very fashionable.

There laid out 10s. upon pendents and painted leather gloves, very pretty and all the mode. Pepys, Diary, I. 404.

Formal mode. See formal.—Immediate mode, a mode which is attributed immediately to its subject; mediate mode, one which is attributed to its subject by the intervention of another mode.—Intrinsic mode, in logic. See intrinsic.—Material mode. See material.—Metaphysical mode of expression. See metaphysical.—Mixed mode. (a) In music. See maneria. (b) pl. In the philosophy of Locke. See def. 5.—Nominal mode, that sort of modification of the meaning of a proposition which may be effected by such phrases as "it is possible that," or "it is necessary that."—Substantial mode, a mode that affects a substance in so far as it is substance (as, for example, existence); accidental mode, a mode which only modifies an accident.=Syn. 1. Method, Way, etc. (see manner[1]), process.

mode[1]† (mōd), v. i. [< mode[1], n.] To conform to the mode or fashion: with an indefinite it. [Rare.]

He could not mode it, or comport either with French fickleness or Italian pride.
Fuller, Worthies, Warwick, III. 274.

mode[2]†, n. A Middle English form of mood[1].

mode-book (mōd′bůk), n. A fashion-book.

Her head-dress cannot be described; it was like nothing in the mode-book or out of it.
Mrs. Henry Wood, East Lynne, vii.

Been modest, and no word m[illegible]ongue deliver'd
To express my insupportable injuries
But gave my heart a wound.
Beau. and Fl., Thierry and Theodoret, ii. 1.

5. Unpretentious.

There is, it is true, a modest hotel for the use of those who make a short visit. Nineteenth Century, XXIV. 487.

=Syn. 1. Unassuming, unpretending, coy, shy. See bashfulness.—2. Decent, chaste, virtuous.

modestless† (mod'est-les), a. [Irreg. < modest + -less.] Without modesty.

Alas! how faithless and how modestless
Are you, that, in your Ephemerides,
Mark th' yeer, the month, and day, which euermore
Gainst years, months, dayes shall dam vp Saturnes dore!
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 1.

modestly (mod'est-li), adv. In a modest manner; with due reserve, propriety, or decorum; unobtrusively; delicately; moderately: as, to speak modestly of one's achievements; to behave, dress, or live modestly.

★modesty (mod'es-ti), n. [< ME. modestie, < OF. (and F.) modestie = Sp. Pg. It. modestia, < L. modestia, moderation, < modestus, modest: see modest.] 1. The quality of being modest; moderation; freedom from exaggeration or excess.

Modestie: which worde not being knowen in the Englyshe tongue, ne of all them whiche vnderstonde Latine, excepte they had red good auctours, they improperly named this vertue dyscrecion. Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, i. 25.

2. Retiring disposition or demeanor; disinclination to presumption, ostentation, or self-assertion; unobtrusiveness; reserve proceeding from absence of over-confidence or self-esteem.

Suit the action to the word, the word to the action; with this special observance, that you o'erstep not the modesty of nature. Shak., Hamlet, iii. 2. 21.

There is a kind of confession in your looks which your modesties have not craft enough to colour.
Shak., Hamlet, ii. 2. 289.

The people carried themselves with much silence and modesty. Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 91.

Modesty is a kind of shame or bashfulness proceeding from the sense a man has of his own defects compared with the perfections of him whom he comes before.
South, Sermons, II. iv.

Next to Sir Andrew in the club-room sits Captain Sentry, a gentleman of great courage, good understanding, but invincible modesty. He is one of those that deserve very well, but are very awkward at putting their talents within the observation of such as should take notice of them.
Steele, Spectator, No. 2.

3. Decorous feeling or behavior; purity or delicacy of thought or manner; reserve proceeding from pure or chaste character.

Talk not to a lady in a way that modesty will not permit her to answer. Richardson, Clarissa Harlowe.

The sister of St. Gregory of Nyssa was afflicted with a cancer in her breast, but could not bear that a surgeon should see it, and was rewarded for her modesty by a miraculous cure. Lecky, Europ. Morals, II. 338.

=Syn. 2. Diffidence, Shyness, etc. See bashfulness.

modesty† (mod'es-ti), v. t. [< modesty, n.] To lose from modesty: with away. [Rare.]

Twice already have you, my dear, if not oftener, modesty'd away such opportunities as you ought not to have slipped.
Richardson, Clarissa Harlowe, IV. 88. (Davies.)

modesty-bit† (mod'es-ti-bit), n. Same as modesty-piece.

Smile if you will, young ladies! your great-grandmothers wore large hoops, peaked stomachers, and modesty-bits.

There was no boote to bid runne for drams to drive down this undigested moddicombe.
Armin, Nest of Ninnies (1608). (Nares.)

Lay open all thy secrets and the mystical hieroglyphick of rashers a' th' coales, modicums, and shoving-hornes.
Dekker, Gull's Hornbook (1609).

modifiability (mod-i-fi-a-bil'i-ti), n. [< modifiable + -ity: see -bility.] Capability or susceptibility of being modified or varied, as in character, type, form, or function.

Living matter once originated, there is no necessity for another origination, since the hypothesis postulates the unlimited, though perhaps not indefinite, modifiability of such matter. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 41.

Other causes than those which are usual become conceivable; other effects can be imagined; and hence there comes an increasing modifiability of opinion.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 486.

modifiable (mod'i-fī-a-bl), a. [< F. modifiable, < L. as if modificabilis*, < modificare, modify: see modify.] Capable of being modified or varied: capable of being changed in character, type, form, or function.

It appears to me more difficult to conceive a distinct visible image in the uniform unvariable essence of God than in variously modifiable matter.
Locke, Examination of Malebranche.

At the same time . . . we clearly recognize the limits which separate what is modifiable from what is unmodifiable. G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, II. 26.

modifiableness (mod'i-fī-a-bl-nes), n. Modifiability.

Buffon, who contended for the modifiableness of species.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXIII. 117.

modificable† (mod'i-fi-ka-bl), a. [< L. as if modificabilis*, modifiable: see modifiable.] Same as modifiable. Bailey.

modificate† (mod'i-fi-kāt), v. t. [< L. modificatus, pp. of modificare, moderate: see modify.] To qualify; modify.

He [Christ] shall reign for ever and ever, not only to the modificated eternity of his mediatorship, . . . but also to the complete eternity of the duration of his humanity.
Ep. Pearson, The Creed, vi.

★modification (mod'i-fi-kā'shon), n. [< F. modification = Sp. modificación = Pg. modificação = It. modificazione, < L. modificatio(n-), a measuring, < modificare, limit, control, modify: see modify.] 1. Determination by a mode or quality; qualification.

The use hereof [of sense] being only to minister to the modification of life in the vital principle, wherein the essence of sense doth consist.
N. Grew, Cosmologia Sacra, ii. 3.

2. The act or process of modifying or altering in character, form, or function; the act or process of producing variation.

Unity of type, maintained under extreme dissimilarities of form and mode of life, is explicable as resulting from descent with modification; but is otherwise inexplicable.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 136.

3. Alteration or change: often specifically in the sense of abatement or reduction.

The chief . . . of all signes . . . is Humane voice, and the several modifications thereof by the Organs of Speech, viz. the Letters of the Alphabet, formed by the several Motions of the Mouth. Holder, Elem. of Speech, p. 6.

For those progressive modifications upon modifications which organic evolution implies, we find a sufficient cause in the modifications after modifications which every environment over the Earth's surface has been undergoing, throughout all geologic and pre-geologic times.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 169.

4. The result of variation or alteration; that which marks or shows variation of character, form, or function; mode, form, or condition reached through process of change, or through being modified.

If it [the soul] be neither matter nor any modification of matter. Clarke, To Mr. Dodswell.

The word modification is properly the bringing a thing into a certain mode of existence, but it is very commonly employed for the mode of existence itself.
Sir W. Hamilton, Metaph., viii.

Every act of will for the control of the mental train, or for the apperception of an object of sense, through concentrated attention, is defined by some particular mental state or modification upon which it is directed.
G. T. Ladd, Physiol. Psychology, p. 537.

5. In Scots law, the determining of the amount of the stipend of the minister of a parish. This is fixed by a decision of the Court of Teinds, called a decree of modification.—6. In music, same as temperament.—Latent mental modification, an unconscious activity of mind. Hamilton.—Mental modification, a state of the mind.=Syn. Change, alteration, variation, qualification.

modificative (mod'i-fi-kā-tiv), n. [= F. modificatif = Sp. Pg. It. modificativo; as modificate + -ive.] That which modifies or serves to modify or qualify.

We may observe that the Spirit of Truth itself, where numbers and measures are concerned, in times, places, and persons, useth the aforesaid modificatives ["almost" and "very nigh"]. Fuller, Worthies, I. xxi.

modificator (mod'i-fi-kā-tor), n. [< modificate + -or.] A modifier.

Nitrogen is an agent distinctly sedative and anti-catarrhal; sulphuretted hydrogen, a modificator of the skin and of mucous membranes. Science, XIV. 318.

modificatory (mod'i-fi-kā-tō-ri), a. [< modificate + -ory.] Tending to modify or produce change in form or condition; modifying.

A certain modificatory syllable.
Whitney, Life and Growth of Lang., p. 131.

modifier (mod'i-fī-er), n. One who or that which ★modifies.

modify (mod'i-fī), v. t.; pret. and pp. modified, ppr. modifying. [< ME. modifien, < F. modifier = Sp. Pg. modificar = It. modificare, < L. modificare, limit, control, regulate, deponent, modificari, measure off, set bounds to, moderate, < modus, measure, + facere, make: see mode[1] and -fy.] 1. To qualify; especially, to moderate or reduce in extent or degree.

Of his grace
He modifies his first severe decree. Dryden.

Morton, at once archbishop and chancellor, allowed his judgment on a fraudulent executor to be modified by the reflexion that he would be "damnée in hell."
Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 317.

2. To change the properties, form, or function of; give a new form to; alter slightly or not very much; vary: as, to modify the terms of a contract; a prefix modifies the sense of a word; light is modified by its transmission through certain media. In crystallography one crystalline form is said to modify another when the two occur together in the same crystal, the modified form predominating; thus, the cube may be modified by the trapezohedron. A highly modified crystal is one showing a large number of different crystalline forms.

The sixteenth statute doth me grete grevaunce,
But ye must that relesse or modifie.
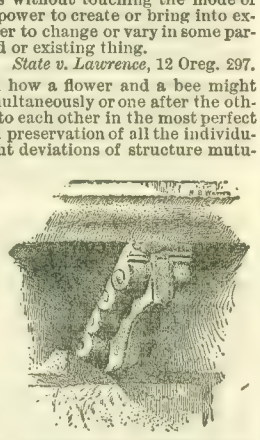
Court of Love, l. 1014.

The middle part of the broad beam of white light which fell upon the paper did, without any confine of shadow to modify it, become coloured all over with one uniform colour. Newton, Opticks.

Modify implies the continued existence of the subject-matter to be modified, but with some change or qualification in form or qualities without touching the mode of creation. It implies no power to create or bring into existence, but only the power to change or vary in some particular an already created or existing thing.
State v. Lawrence, 12 Oreg. 297.



Thus I can understand how a flower and a bee might slowly become, either simultaneously or one after the other, modified and adapted to each other in the most perfect manner, by the continued preservation of all the individuals which presented slight deviations of structure mutually favorable to each other. Darwin, Origin [of Species, p. 98.

Modified logic. See pure logic, under logic.

modii, n. Plural of modius.

modilich†, adv. A Middle English form of moodily.

modillion (mō-dil'yon), n. [< OF. modillon, modiglion, F. modillon = Sp. modillón = Pg. modilhão, < It. modiglione, a modillion, poss. < L. mutulus, mutule: see mutule.] In arch., a block carved into the form of an enriched bracket, used normally under the corona in the cornice of the Corinthian and Composite, and occasionally of the Roman Ionic, orders, and in Renaissance and modern designs based upon these, and also in appropriate forms in the various medieval styles; a corbel; a bracket. Compare mutule. Also spelled modillon.—Angular modillion, a modillion at the return of a cornice, in the diagonal vertical plane passing through the angle or miter of the cornice.

modulant (mod'ū-lant), n. [< L. modulan(t-)s, ppr. of modulari, modulate: see modulate.]

Modius.—Head of Statuette of Kora or Proserpine, found at Cnidus.

That which modulates or varies. See modulate, v. t., 2.

In modern English verse alliteration only plays the subordinate part of a modulant, not to be unduly decried where not overdone.

E. Wadham, Eng. Versification, p. 119.

modular (moḏ′ū-lăr), a. [= F. modulaire; as module + -ar[3].] Pertaining to modulation; pertaining to or regulated by a module or a modulus.—Modular equation. See equation.—Modular focus, a focus of a conicoid or quadric surface. "The distance of any point on the quadric from such a focus is in a constant ratio to its distance from the corresponding directrix, the latter distance being measured parallel to either of the planes of circular section." (Salmon.)—Modular function, a higher periodic function connected with a group of periods where $ad - bc = 1$.—Modular method of generation of quadrics, a method based on the fundamental property of the modular foci.—Modular numbers, in Landen's transformation, numbers approximating to the value of the new modulus. They are the successive approximations in the process of finding the arithmetico-geometrical mean of the old complementary modulus and unity.—Modular ratio, the modulus of a system of logarithms. See logarithm.—Modular transformation of an elliptic integral, a transformation of the elliptic integral into another with a different modulus.

modulate (moḏ′ū-lāt), v.; pret. and pp. modulated, ppr. modulating. [< L. modulatus, pp. of modulari, measure, regulate, modulate, < modulus, measure: see modulus. Cf. module, v.] I. trans. 1. To modify; adjust; adapt; regulate.

With the gift of song, Carlyle would have been the greatest of epic poets since Homer. Without it, to modulate and harmonize and bring parts into their proper relation, he is the most amorphous of humorists, the most shining avatar of whim the world has ever seen.

Lowell, Study Windows, p. 148.

2. To vary or inflect the sound or utterance of, especially so as to give expressiveness to what is uttered; vary or adapt in tone.

In all vocal musick it [the tongue] helpeth the windpipe to modulate the sounds.

N. Grew, Cosmologia Sacra, I. v. 16.

He listened to the voice of nature, and modulated his own unto it. Sterne, Tristram Shandy, v. 3.

Caius Gracchus, it is said, when he harangued the Roman populace, modulated his tone by an oratorical flute or pitch-pipe. Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 213.

We are conscious of a murmuring humble voice: it is a beggar, who is modulating a prayer for alms and bowing assiduously. Harper's Mag., LXXIX. 680.

3. To vary the pitch of; inflect; melodize.

The master's hand, in modulated air,
Bids the loud organ breathe.

Somerville, The Chase, iii.

He [Glück] is to play on a set of drinking-glasses, which he modulates with water. Walpole, Letters, II. 14.

4. In music, to change from one key (tonality) to another, by utilizing one or more of the tones common to both.

II. intrans. 1. In music, to pass from one key (tonality) into another, or from the major into the minor mode, or vice versa. See modulation, 3 (b). Hence—2. To vary, oscillate, or fluctuate. [Rare.]

It is written from no well-defined standpoint, but modulates from illustrations of the Rochefort experimenters to the telepathic drawings of the English society for psychic research, and thence to the localization diagrams of Ferrier, with no clear method. Amer. Jour. Psychol., I. 516.

★modulation (moḏ-ū-lā′shọn), n. [< F. modulation = Sp. modulación = Pg. modulação = It. modulazione, < L. modulatio(n-), < modulari, regulate, modulate: see modulate.] 1. The act of modulating. (a) The act of modifying, adjusting, or adapting.

The emperours . . . delited in daunsyng, perceyuing therein to be a perfecte measure, whiche maye be called modulation. Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, i. 20.

When we fix ourselves upon the meditation and modulation of the mercy of God, even his judgments cannot put us out of tune, but we shall sing and be cheerful even in them. Donne, Sermons, ii.

(b) The act of inflecting the voice or any instrument in a musical manner.

The rings of the wind-pipe are fitted for the modulation of the voice. N. Grew, Cosmologia Sacra, I. v. 10.

(c) The modification of the voice or of utterance to express various shades of meaning or emotion.

The poets of Elizabeth had attained an art of modulation which was afterwards neglected and forgotten.

Johnson, Waller.

2. A state or condition reached by a process of modulating, modifying, or varying.

That delicate modulation of surface treatment which gives high value to the best Florentine metal work.

C. C. Perkins, Italian Sculpture, p. 124.

3. (a) In Gregorian music, one of the tones in a mode with which every phrase of a melody in that mode must begin and end. The regular modulations of each mode include the final, the dominant, the mediant, and the participant, each of which has its own peculiar functions. (See these words, and also mode[1].) To these are added two other tones in each mode, called conceded modulations, which are of minor importance. (b) In mod. music, the act, process, or result of changing, in the course of a piece, from one key (tonality) to another, so that a new tone becomes the key-note and the relative significance of all the tones common to both tonalities is altered. When a tone foreign to the original tonality of a piece is used, a modulatory effect is nearly always produced. If this effect is carried out into a cadence in the new key, the modulation is called final; otherwise it is passing or transient. All modulations, however, require a return to the original key before the end of the piece. The tone by which the transition is introduced or effected is called the note of modulation; this tone in the simpler forms of modulation is usually the fourth or the seventh tone of the new key. The simplicity of a modulation depends upon the closeness of relationship between the keys involved. The simplest modulations are into the keys either of the dominant or of the subdominant, and are effected by sharping the fourth tone or flatting the seventh tone respectively of the original key. Modulations into the relative minor or into the minor keys of the supertonic or of the mediant are effected by sharping the fifth, the first, or the second tone of the original key respectively. Numerous other more intricate modulations are possible, especially in instrumental music. A modulation is abrupt, distant, or extraneous, when it leads into a key not closely related with the original one. It is deceptive when it utilizes a series of chords in an unusual and startling way. It is melodic when produced by the introduction of a tone foreign to the original tonality, and harmonic when produced by the use of a chord common to both tonalities first in its relation to one and then in that to the other. It is enharmonic when it is effected on an instrument of fixed intonation, like the pianoforte, by calling a key (digital) first by one name and then by another, as when E♭ in the key of B♭ is called D♯ in the key of B♯. Modulation is one of the most important resources of modern music. It introduces endless variety of both melodic and harmonic effect, with great possibilities in the way of sequences and imitations. It increases the unity of a composition and the importance of the original tonality by introducing a temporary disturbance of original tonal relations, with a subsequent complete and emphatic resumption of them. It affords means for the expression of very complex emotional conditions, particularly those of unrest, contrast, etc. In the style of Wagner it has often been pushed to the limit of toleration, so as almost to destroy that sense of fixed tonality which is the basis of musical certitude. The most remarkable harmonic convenience for modulation, at least in instrumental music, is a chord of four tones consisting of three minor thirds successively superposed, which is called the chord of the diminished seventh. This chord may be regarded as based upon any one of its four tones, which is then the seventh tone of either a major or a minor scale. Its harmonic nature is therefore peculiarly ambiguous and unstable. (c) A musical composition exemplifying modulation.—4. Sound modulated; melody.

Innumerous songsters, in the freshening shade
Of new-spring leaves, their modulations mix Mellifluous. Thomson, Spring, l. 609.

5. In arch., the proportion of the different parts of an order according to a module. = Syn. 1 (b). Accent, etc. See inflection.

modulator (moḏ′ū-lā-tọr), n. [= F. modulateur = Sp. Pg. modulador = It. modulatore, < L. modulator, a regulator, director, < modulari, regulate: see modulate.] 1. One who or that which modulates.

What a variety of uses hath nature laid upon that one member, the tongue, the grand instrument of taste, the faithful judge, the centinel, the watchman of all our nourishment, the artful modulator of our voice!

Derham, Physico-Theology, v. 5.

2. A chart of the musical scale, indicating the relations of its essential tones to each other and of the whole scale to its related scales. The form of modulator generally used in the tonic sol-fa system of teaching music is shown in the accompanying chart.

Modulator.

modulatory (moḏ′ū-lā-tọ-ri), a. [< modulate + -ory.] Of or pertaining to modulation.

Modulations are really governed by the same laws which apply to any succession of harmonies whatsoever, and the possibilities of modulatory device are in the end chiefly dependant upon intelligible order in the progression of the parts.

Grove's Dict. Music, II. 345.

★module (moḏ′ūl), n. [< F. module = Sp. módulo = Pg. It. modulo, a measure, module, < L. modulus, a small measure, a measure, mode, meter, dim. of modus, measure: see mode[1]. Cf. modulus, model, mold[4].] 1†. A little measure; hence, a small quantity.—2. In arch., a standard of measure often taken, particularly in antiquity and the middle ages, to regulate the proportions of an order or the disposition of an entire building. In the classical styles the diameter or semidiameter of the column at the base of the shaft is usually selected as the module, and this is subdivided into parts or minutes, the diameter generally into sixty or the semidiameter into thirty. Some architects employ no fixed number of divisions of the module, but divide it into as many parts as they deem serviceable for the work in hand.

3†. A model or representation; a mold; a pattern.

Among so many Modules admirable,
Th' admired beauties of the King of Creatures,
Com, com, and see the Womans rapting features.

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 6.

4. In numis., the size of a coin or medal, measured by the diameter. [Rare.]

module† (moḏ′ūl), v. t. [< F. moduler = Sp. Pg. modular = It. modulare, modolare, modulate, < L. modulari, regulate, modulate: see modulate.] 1. To model; shape.

O, would I could my father's cunning use,
And souls into well moduled clay infuse.

Sandys, Ovid (1638), p. 10. (Latham.)

2. To modulate.

That Charmer of the Night, . . .
That moduleth her tunes so admirably rare,
As man to set in parts at first had learn'd of her.

Drayton, Polyolbion, xiii. 70.

modulet† (moḏ′ū-let), n. [< module + -et.] A small model; a microcosm.

But soft, my Muse: what? wilt thou re-repeat
The Little-Worlds admired Modulet?

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 7.

Modulidæ (mọ̄-dū′li-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Modulus + -idæ.] A family of tænioglossate rostriferous gastropods represented by the genus Modulus. The animal has a radula like that of the Cerithiidæ, but has no siphon, and the shell is holostomatous and trochiform, but with a columellar tooth. The species are inhabitants of tropical seas, and one, Modulus tectum, is abundant in the West Indies.

modulize† (moḏ′ū-līz), v. t. [< module + -ize.] To model.

While with the Duke, th' Eternall did deuise,
And to his inward sight did modulize
His Tabernacle's admirable Form.

Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Lawe.

★modulus (moḏ′ū-lus), n. [< L. modulus, a measure, dim. of modus, measure: see module, mode[1].] 1. In math., a real positive number that serves as measure or parameter of a function or effect. Represented by M. or μ.—2. In physics, the measure of an effect under conditions whose measure is unity. Thus, a physical modulus is not a number, but a physical quantity.—3. [cap.] In conch., a genus of gastropods, referred to the Littorinidæ or periwinkles, or made type of the family Modulidæ. The shell is depressed and trochiform, with a deeply cut columellar tooth and many-whorled operculum.—Absolute modulus of gravitation, the acceleration due to the gravitation of a body toward a mass of one gram at a distance of one centimeter. It amounts to 648×10^{-10} centimeters per second.—Angle of the modulus, in math., the angle of which the modulus is the sine.—Complementary modulus, in math., the cosine of the angle of the modulus.—Gravity-modulus in physics, a modulus of elasticity in which the weight of a unit mass is taken as the unit of force.—Length of modulus, in physics, a modulus of elasticity expressed as a length by taking the weight of the unit volume of the material referred to as the unit of force.—Modulus of a congruence, in math., that measure or divisor which gives equal remainders when the two congruent numbers are divided by it, this constituting the congruence. Thus, 23 is congruent to 2, the modulus being 7; and this is written by Gauss and others $23 \equiv 2 \pmod 7$.—Modulus of a linear transformation, in math., the square of the determinant of the matrix of transformation—that is, if the transformation takes place according to the equations

$$x = a\xi + b\eta + c\zeta$$
$$y = d\xi + e\eta + f\zeta$$ $$z = g\xi + h\eta + i\zeta,$$ then the modulus of transformation is $$\begin{vmatrix} a, b, c \\ d, e, f \\ g, h, i \end{vmatrix}^2$$

Modulus of a machine, the ratio of the load to the power in equilibrium.—Modulus of a matrix, in math., the determinant of the matrix, this having the same elements arranged in the same way.—Modulus of an elliptic integral, differential, or function, in math., that positive number less than unity the square of which multiplies the square of the sine of the amplitude or variable angle in the delta or square root which enters into the expression of such a quantity.—Modulus of an imaginary, in math., that real positive number which multiplied by a root of unity gives the imaginary.—Modulus of a system of logarithms, in math. See logarithm.—Modulus of elasticity, in physics, in its general sense, the quantity of elasticity or the ratio of a stress to the strain that occasions it: but applied by older and less careful writers to Young's modulus [named after its inventor, Dr. Thomas Young, a celebrated English physicist (1773–1829)], which is the pressure or tension on the end of a bar per unit of section divided by the compression or elongation per unit of length so produced. See elasticity.—Modulus of gravitation, in astron., the square root of the component acceleration due to gravitation of any body toward the sun at a distance equal to the mean distance of the earth. See absolute modulus, above.—Modulus of propulsion. See the quotation.

As 100 cubic inches of cylinder capacity are needed to move an engine with 20 tons adhesive weight one inch, if we divide 100 by 20 we will get the cylinder capacity needed for each ton. That is, $100 \div 20 = 5$ cubic in. cylinder capacity per ton (of 2,000 lbs.) of adhesive weight is needed to move any locomotive one inch. This quantity we have named the modulus of propulsion.

Forney, Locomotive, p. 415.

Quadratic modulus, in math., the square of the determinant.—Young's modulus. See modulus of elasticity, above.

modus (mō′dus), n. [< L. modus, manner, mode: see mode[1].] 1. Manner; mode: same as mode[1].

We are not to hope that the modus of it should fall, or be comprehended, under human enquiry.

Bacon, Physical Fables, viii., Expl.

The same evangelical power did institute that calling, for the modus of whose election it took such particular order. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 164.

2. In Rom. and civil law, and early Eng. law, the manner or qualifying terms of a gift or disposition of property. The introduction of writing as the instrument of gift or transfer enabled donors to vary the customary legal consequences by expressing an intent as to the manner or mode in which the act should have effect; and that part of the instrument which thus qualified what otherwise would have been the ordinary legal effect was termed the modus, and the same term was used to designate the legal qualification thus imposed. Hence, more specifically—(a) The clause in a will or other gift (and the legal obligation created thereby) by which the donor charged an obligation upon the legatee or donee, not as a condition the breach of which would create a forfeiture, but as a personal obligation, which the legatee would assume by accepting the gift. (b) Also, in early Eng. law, the clause in a conveyance enlarging or restricting the estate which otherwise would be granted by it, as for instance by giving to the donee and his heirs, or his heirs and assigns, or by giving to the donee and only a specified class of heirs. Hence the old common-law maxims modus et conventio vincunt legem and modus legem dat donationi, meaning specific qualification and express agreement override the law, or give the law to the transfer. (c) In eccles. law, the exemption, or partial exemption, from the payment of tithes, termed modus decimandi and modus non decimandi respectively.

One terrible circumstance of this bill is turning the tithe of flax and hemp into what the lawyers call a modus, or a certain sum in lieu of a tenth part of the product. Swift.

A tithe of turf and a tithe of furze had been lately introduced, and certain moduses, or compositions, which had elsewhere been substituted for other tithes, were in this province [Munster] unknown.

Lecky, Eng. in 18th Cent., xvi.

Modus operandi, a plan or mode of working.—Modus ponens, in logic, inference from a hypothetical proposition and the truth of the antecedent to the truth of the consequent: as, If I am bad, I deserve punishment; I am bad, hence I deserve punishment.—Modus tollens, in logic, the inference from a hypothetical proposition and the falsity of the consequent to the falsity of the antecedent: as, If I were to jump out of the window, I should break my neck: now I won't break my neck, hence I sha'n't jump out of the window.—Modus vivendi, a manner or way of living; a temporary arrangement pending a settlement of matters in debate, as between two nations.

modwall (mod′wâl), n. [Also mudwall, midwall; origin obscure.] The bee-eater, Merops apiaster. [Local, British.]

mody[1]† (mō′di), a. [< mode[1] + -y[1].] Fashionable; modish.

Mr. Longman, you make me too rich and too mody.

Richardson, Pamela, I. 128. (Davies.)

mody[2]†, a. An obsolete form of moody.

moe[1], a. and adv. See mo.

moe[2]†, n. and v. An obsolete form of mow[5].

moeble†, a. and n. Same as moble[1].

moellon (mwo-loṅ′), n. [F., < OF. moilon, moylon, broken stone, rubble, cf. moilon, moelon, middle, center, < moelle, marrow, pith, = Sp. meollo = Pg. medulla = It. midollo, < L. medulla, marrow, pith, crumbs, < medius, middle. Cf. OF. moye, moie, the soft part of stone, < L. media, fem. of medius, middle: see medium. Cf. moiety.] Rubble-stone, sometimes used in architecture, set in mortar, for such uses as filling between the facing-walls of a structure or in the spandrels of a bridge.

mœrologist (mē-rol′ō-jist), n. [< mœrology + -ist.] A professional mourner. [Rare.]

mœrology (mē-rol′ō-ji), n. [< Gr. μοῖρα, part, lot, fate, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The practice or art of professional mourning.

Mœsogoth (mē′sō-goth), n. [< NL. (ML. ?) Mœsogothi, pl., < L. Mœsi, Gr. Μοισοί, Μυσοί, a people of Thrace, L. Mœsia, Gr. *Μοισία, Μυσία (Μυσία ἡ ἐν Εὐρώπῃ, Mysia in Europe, in distinction from Mysia in Asia Minor), their country (see def.), + Gothi, Gr. Γόθοι, Goths: see Goth.] One of those Goths who settled in Mœsia, a Roman province north of the Balkans, south of the Danube, and east of Illyricum, and there, under the protection of the Roman emperors, devoted themselves to agricultural pursuits. The Mœsogoths were converted to Christianity in its Arian form by Bishop Ulfilas in the fourth century. See Goth.

Mœsogothic (mē-sō-goth′ik), a. and n. [< NL. Mœsogothicus, < Mœsogothi, the Mœsogoths: see Mœsogoth.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Mœsogoths or their language.

II. n. The language of the Mœsogoths. See Gothic, n.

mofet†, v. An obsolete form of move.

mofette (mō-fet′), n. [= Sp. mofeta, < It. (dial.) mofetta, < L. mephitis, a noxious exhalation: see mephitic.] An irrespirable gas escaping from the earth; a gas-spring. It is sometimes (although rarely) applied by writers in English to carbonic-acid gas escaping from the rocks in regions of nearly extinct volcanism, and, by extension, to the openings from which this gas escapes. The mofettes are analogous to the soffioni or "blow-holes," but betoken a still further advance of the region toward complete extinction of the volcanic forces.

moffle (mof′l), v. i.; pret. and pp. moffled, ppr. moffling. [Freq. of muff (?). Cf. maffle.] To do anything clumsily or ineffectually; botch. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

mofussil (mō-fus′il), n. [Hind. mufassal, the country as distinguished from the town, lit. separate, < Ar. fasala, separate, fassala, cut, cut out, detail.] In India, the country stations and districts as distinguished from the residencies; or, in a district, the rural localities as distinguished from a station or official residency; the country as distinguished from towns.

A whiff of freshness and fragrance from the mofussil will be as the mangoes and the dorians.

J. W. Palmer, The New and the Old, p. 303.

mog[1]†, v. i. See mug[2].

mog[2] (mog), v. i.; pret. and pp. mogged, ppr. mogging. [Origin obscure.] To move away. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

Mogadore gum. Same as Barbary gum (which see, under gum[2]).

Mogdad coffee. See coffee.

moggan (mog′an), n. [< Gael. and Ir. mogan.] A footless stocking. [Scotch.]

mogilalia (moj-i-lā′li-ạ), n. [NL., < Gr. μογιλάλος, hardly speaking, < μόγις, hardly, + λαλεῖν, talk, prattle.] In pathol., stammering speech.

Mograbian (mō-grā′bi-an), a. and n. [< Ar. and Turk. Moghrab, Mograb (see Mograbin), + -ian.] Same as Mograbin.

Mograbin (mō′gra-bin), a. and n. [Also Maghrabin, Mughrabin, Mohgrabin (?), Maugrabin; < Ar. Turk. Moghrabī, < Moghrab, Mograb (see def.). Cf. Mograbian.] I. a. Relating to Mograb, a region in northern Africa, regarded as nearly equivalent to the coast-region of Morocco and Algeria.

II. n. An inhabitant of Mograb.

My proper name is only known to my brethren. The men beyond our tents call me Hayraddin Maugrabin—that is, Hayraddin the African Moor.

Scott, Quentin Durward, xvi.

Mogul (mō-gul′), n. and a. [= F. Sp. Pg. Mogol = Ar. Moghul = Pers. Moghol, Mughal = Turk. Mughul, < Hind. Mughal, < Mongolian Mongol, Mongol: see Mongol.] I. n. 1. A Mongol or Mongolian; specifically, in hist., one of the followers of Baber, conqueror of Hindustan in the sixteenth century.—2. A name for the best quality of playing-cards.—Mogul engine. See engine.—The Great Mogul. (a) The common designation among Europeans of the sovereign of the so-called Mogul empire, or empire of Delhi, at one time including most of Hindustan, established by Baber about 1526, and brought under British control in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, the last nominal emperor being deposed in 1857. Also called simply the Mogul.

King, poet, priest, the Mogul was to the good Mahommedan what a descendant of the House of Jesse would be to a nation of Jews. W. H. Russell, Diary in India, II. 62.

Hence—(b) Any great personage.

II. a. Of or relating to the Moguls, or the Mongol empire in India: as, the Mogul language; the Mogul dynasty.—Mogul architecture, the style of Mohammedan architecture evolved and carried out by the Mogul emperors in India, from the sixteenth to the nineteenth century. The period was one of lavish expenditure in building, and innumerable mosques, royal tombs, and palaces testify to its artistic originality, to its excellent use of both arched and columnar construction, and of the dome, characteristically of bulbous form, and to the delicacy and good taste of its decorators in carving and in inlaying with precious stones. The arches are usually pointed, and as a rule resemble in outline the so-called Tudor arch. Minarets and especially small pavilions covered with domical roofs, either surrounding a large dome or placed in great numbers at the angles or along the parapets of the copings of palaces, are other characteristic features.

Moguntine (mō-gun′tin), a. [< L. Moguntia, also Mogontiacum, Magontiacum, Magontiacus, the ancient name of the city now called in G. Mainz, sometimes Mentz, in F. Mayence.] Of or pertaining to Mainz, a city at the junction of the Rhine and the Main.

moha (mō′hä), n. The grass Chætochloa Italica, or Italian millet.

mohair (mō′hãr), n. and a. [Formerly also mockaire; < OF. mouhaire, mouaire, mohere, F. moire (> E. moire, G. mohr, moire = Pr. moira = Sp moaré, muer, mué = Pg. morim = It. moerro), mohair; cf. It. mocajardo, haircloth; prob. < Ar. mukhayyar, a fabric of goat's hair, a kind of camlet.] I. n. 1. The hair of the Angora goat, a native of Asia Minor.—2. A kind of fine camlet made of such hair, sometimes watered (see moire); also, an imitation of the real mohair made of wool and cotton, much used for women's dress.

Cloth of Wooll, Karsies, Mockaires, Chamlets, and all sortes of Silke. Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 273.

She, . . . when she sees her friend in deep despair, Observes how much a chintz exceeds mohair!

Pope, Moral Essays, ii. 170.

Mohair glacé, a French dress-goods made of cotton and goat's hair.

II. a. Made of mohair: as, a mohair cloak.—Mohair braid, a braid used for binding garments.—Mohair luster, a black dress-goods of cotton and mohair. It has some resemblance to alpaca.

monair-shell (mō′hãr shel), n. In conch., a certain species of Voluta, of a closely and finely reticulated texture, having a resemblance to mohair.

Mohamedan†, a. and n. An obsolete form of Mohammedan.

Mohammedan (mō-ham′e-dạn), a. and n. [Also Mohammadan, Muhammadan (also Mahomedan, Mahometan, q. v.) (= D. Mohamedaan = G. Mohamedaner = Sw. Mohammedan, Muhamedan = Dan. Muhamedaner = Hind. Muhammadī), < Mohammed, < Ar. Muhammad, a man's name, lit. 'praised,' < hamada, praise. From the Ar. Muhammad are also ult. E. Mahound, Mahoun, maumet, mammet, etc.] I. a. Pertaining to Mohammed, or Mahomet (about A. D. 570 to 632), the founder of the Moslem religion, and after his flight from Mecca (622) the creator of the realm which grew into the Saracenic empire; pertaining to the religious and social system founded by Mohammed.—Mohammedan calendar, era, etc. See the nouns.

II. n. A follower of Mohammed, the founder of the Moslem religion; one who professes Mohammedanism; a Moslem or Mussulman.

Mohammedanism (mō-ham′e-dan-izm), n. [< Mohammedan + -ism.] 1. The Mohammedan religion and polity; the religious and ethical system taught in the Koran; Islamism.—2. Belief in or adherence to the teachings of Mohammed.

Mohammedanize (mō-ham′e-dan-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. Mohammedanized, ppr. Mohammedanizing. [< Mohammedan + -ize.] To make conformable to the principles or rites of Mohammed; make Mohammedan; convert to Islam. Also spelled Mohammedanise.

Mohammedism (mō-ham′e-dizm), n. [< Mohammed + -ism.] Same as Mohammedanism.

Mohammedize (mō-ham′e-dīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. Mohammedized, ppr. Mohammedizing. Same as Mohammedanize.

moharra, n. See mojarra.

Moharram (mo-har′am), n. Same as Muharram.

Mohawk (mō′hâk), n. [Formerly also Mohock, Mohack; cognate with the Narraganset Mohowaùuck, 'they eat (animate) things,' hence 'man-eaters.'] 1. One of a tribe of American Indians of the Huron-Iroquois family, situated along the Mohawk river. It was the easternmost of the Five Nations. See Iroquois. They call themselves Kaniengehaga, 'people of the place of the flint.' Handbook of Amer. Indians, I. 921.

2. A ruffian; specifically [cap. or l. c.], one of those who infested the streets of London about the beginning of the eighteenth century: so called from the Indian tribe of that name.

> Give him [a youngster] Port and potent Sack;
> From a Milksop he starts up Mohack.
> Prior, Alma, iii.

> Did I tell you of a race of rakes, called the Mohocks, that play the devil about this town every night, slit people's noses and beat them, etc.?
> Swift, Journal to Stella, March 8, 1711.

> The Mohock-club, a name borrowed it seems from a sort of cannibals in India, who subsist by plundering and devouring all the nations about them.
> Steele, Spectator, No. 324.

> Who has not trembled at the Mohock's name?
> Gay, Trivia, iii. 326.

Mohegan (mō-hē′gan), a. and n. Same as Mohican.

Mohican (mō-hē′kan), a. and n. [Also Mohegan; from the native name.] I. a. Of or relating to the Mohicans or Mohegans.

II. n. One of a tribe of American Indians of the Algonkian stock.

Yellow-tufted Moho (Moho nobilis).

Moho (mō′hō), n. [NL., < Hawaiian moho, the bird here defined.] 1. A genus of meliphagine birds peculiar to the Sandwich Islands, named by Lesson in 1831. The bill is arcuate, longer than the head, with naked operculate nostrils; the tarsi are booted; and the plumage is blackish with yellow pectoral tufts and some white tail-feathers. There are 2 species, M. nobilis and M. apicalis, formerly called yellow-tufted bee-eater. Also Mohoa (Reichenbach, 1850) and Acrulocercus (Cabanis, 1847).

2. [l. c.] Any bird of this genus.

Mohock†, n. An obsolete form of Mohawk.

mohoe (mō-hō′), n. [Also moho, mohaut.] Same as mahoe, 1.

mohr (mōr), n. [Ar.: cf. mohr, a colt.] An African antelope or gazel, Gazella mohr. The horns are annulated with ten or twelve complete rings. It is much sought after by the Arabs, on account of producing the bezoar-stones so highly valued in Eastern medicine, commonly called in Morocco mohr's eggs. A related species, Gazella sœmmeringi, is known as Sömmering's mohr. Also mohor and mhorr.

mohsite (mō′sīt), n. [Named after Friedrich Mohs, a German mineralogist (1773–1839).] Native titanic iron, or ilmenite.

mohur (mō′hėr), n. [Also mohar; < Hind. muhar, muhr, mohr, < Pers. muhur, muhr, mohr, a seal, a gold coin.] A modern gold coin of India under the British dominion, equivalent Obverse. Reverse.

Mohur. (Size of the original.)

to 15 rupees, or about $7; also, a gold coin of the native princes of India from the sixteenth century onward.

mohwa-tree, n. See mahwa-tree.

moider (moi′dėr), v. [Also moither; cf. muddle.] I. trans. 1. To confuse; perplex; distract; bewilder.

> I've been strangely moyder'd e're sin 'bout this same news oth' French king. I conno believe 'tis true.
> Wit of a Woman (1705). (Nares.)

> You'll happen be a bit moithered with it [a child] while it's so little. George Eliot, Silas Marner, xiv.

2. To spend in labor.

> She lived only to scrape and hoard, moidering away her loveless life in the futile energies and sordid aims of a miser's wretched pleasure. Cornhill Mag.

[Obsolete or prov. Eng. in both uses.]

II. intrans. To labor hard; toil. [Prov. Eng.]

moidore (moi′dōr), n. [Also moedore; < Pg. moeda d'ouro, lit. money or coin of gold: moeda, < L. moneta, money; de, < L. de, of; ouro, < L. aurum, gold: see money, de[2], and aurum, or[3].]

Obverse. Reverse.

Moidore. (Size of the original.)

A gold coin (also called lisbonine) formerly current in Portugal. It was equivalent in value to about $6.50.

> He says his expenses in the relief of our prisoners have been upwards of fifty moidores.
> Jefferson, Correspondence, I. 231.

moiety (moi′e-ti), n.; pl. moieties (-tiz). [Formerly also moitie; < F. moitié = Sp. mitad = Pg. metade = It. metà, a half, < L. medieta(t-)s, a half, the middle, a middle course, < medius, middle: see mediety and medium.] 1. A half part or share; one of two equal parts: as, a moiety of an estate, of goods, or of profits.

> The charge there would be so great by crauers and expenses that the moitie of the profite would bee wholly consumed. Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 257.

2. A portion; a share.

> Methinks my moiety, north from Burton here,
> In quantity equals not one of yours.
> Shak., 1 Hen. IV., iii. 1. 96.

Anti-moiety law, a United States statute of 1874, which repealed all United States moiety acts.—Moiety act, a statute giving one half of fines, penalties, and forfeitures to informers or private prosecutors.—Moiety system, a system at one time adopted by the United States government for finding out the names and indebtedness of delinquent taxpayers, by which the informer or person making the discovery and aiding in the collection received as compensation a certain proportion of the amount collected.

moil[1] (moil), v. [Early mod. E. also moile, moyle; < ME. moilen, moillen, moylen, moisten, < OF. moiller, moiler, moillier, muiller, F. mouiller = Pr. molhar = Sp. mollear, mojar = Pg. molhar = It. mollare, wet, moisten, < L. as if molliare,* for mollire, soften, < mollis, soft: see moll[2]. Connection with L. moliri, toil (see molimen), or with W. mael, toil, or with obs. E. moil[2], a mule, need not be assumed.] I. trans. 1†. To wet; moisten.—2. To soil; dirty; daub.

> When the day was therefore come, and that he saw that it rayned still worse then it did before, hee pitied the centinels so too moyled and wette.
> Hakluyt's Voyages, III. 354. (Richardson.)

> All they which were left were moiled with dirt and mire by reason of the deepness of the rotten way.
> Knolles, Hist. Turks.

> At first happy news came, in gay letters moiled
> With my kisses.

Moire antique, silk watered in the antique style so as to resemble the materials worn in olden times.

moiré (mwo-rā′), n. [F.] Same as moire, 1.—Moiré antique. See moire antique, under moire.—Moiré métallique, tin-plate, or iron-plate which has been first coated with tin, so treated by acids as to give it a clouded, variegated, or variously crystallized surface. The effect is enhanced by heating the plate irregularly with a blowpipe immediately before applying the acids, or by first heating the plate, and then sprinkling it with water to cool it irregularly, and immediately applying the acids. The surface to be treated is first cleaned by washing with alkaline water, then dried, then dipped in dilute nitric or hydrochloric acid, then washed in pure water, and afterward in lime-water, to neutralize any remaining traces of acid, and dried. Lastly, the surface is usually covered with a tinted transparent lacquer. Plates of clean iron dipped in melted zinc, in the so-called galvanizing process, often acquire a beautiful crystalline surface, resembling in general effect the moiré métallique.

moiré (mwo-rā′), v. t.; pret. and pp. moiréed, ppr. moiréing. [< moiré, n.] To give a variety of shades to, by the moiré métallique process of tin-coating.

Damp* is generally applied where the slight wetness has come from without, and also where it is undesirable or unpleasant: as, a damp cellar, damp sheets, a damp evening. Dank strongly suggests a disagreeable, chilling, or unwholesome moistness. Moist may be a general word, but it is rarely used where the wetness is merely external or where it is unpleasant: as, a moist sponge, a moist hand, moist leather. "If we said the ground was moist, we should probably mean in a favorable condition for vegetation; if we said it was damp, we should probably mean that we ought to be careful about walking upon it." (C. J. Smith, Synonyms Discriminated, p. 293.) Humid is a literary or scientific term for moist, but would be applicable only to that which is so penetrated with moisture that the moisture seems a part of it: as, humid ground, but not a humid sponge or hand.

Combing out her long black hair
Damp from the river. Tennyson, Princess, iv.

My lips were wet, my throat was cold,
My garments all were dank.
Coleridge, Ancient Mariner.

Give me your hand; this hand is moist, my lady.

★mold[2], mould[2] (mōld), n. [See mold[2], v. and p. a.] A minute fungus or other vegetable growth of a low type, especially one of such vegetable organisms as appear on articles of food when left neglected, decaying matter, bodies which lie long in warm and damp air, animal and vegetable tissues, etc.; in a somewhat looser sense, mustiness or incipient decay. Most of the common molds belong to the genus Mucor. M. Mucedo forms small downy tufts of grayish-white color on bread, decaying fruit, etc. Sporodinia aspergillus occurs on decaying mushrooms. Phycomyces nitens, a related form, grows on oily or greasy substances. The common blue mold on decaying bread, cheese, etc., is Penicillium crustaceum. See Mucor, 2, Penicillium.

Mold (Penicillium crustaceum), magnified. m, the mycelium; c, the conidia.

All moulds are inceptions of putrefaction, as the moulds of pies and flesh, which moulds afterwards turn into worms. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 339.

Black mold, a general name for certain hyphomycetous fungi having dark-colored or carbonized mycelium, belonging chiefly to the family Dermatiaceæ.

mold[3], mould[3] (mōld), n. [A later form, with excrescent d, of mole[1]. Prob. due in part to confusion with mold[1], mold[2]. The form is extant chiefly in iron-mold.] A spot; a stain, as that caused by rust.

Upon the little brest, like christall bright,
She mote perceive a litle purple mold,
That like a rose her silken leaves did fairg unfold.
Spenser, F. Q., VI. xii. 7.

The mould of a man's fortune is in his own hands.
Bacon, Essays, Fortune.

New honours come upon him,
Like our strange garments, cleave not to their mould
But with the aid of use. Shak., Macbeth, i. 3. 145.

Made in his image! Sweet and gracious souls,
Dear to my heart by nature's fondest names,
Is not your memory still the precious mould
That lends its form to Him who hears my prayer?
O. W. Holmes, Love.

2. Form; shape; cast; character.

My sonne, if thou of suche a molde
Art made, now tell me pleine thy shrift.
Gower, Conf. Amant., iv.

French churches, both under others abroad and at home in their own country, all cast according to that mould which Calvin had made. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, Pref., ii.

The expectancy and rose of the fair state,
The glass of fashion, and the mould of form.

Men of mould
Well embodied, well ensouled.
Emerson, Monadnoc.

3. Specifically, in founding, the form into which a fused metal is run to obtain a cast. Molds for metals and alloys having a low melting-point, as lead, type-metal, Britannia metal, etc., are made of iron or plaster of Paris, and may be used many times. Molds for the less fusible metals and alloys, as iron, brass, bell-metal, etc., are made in sand or loam and are divided into three classes: (a) Open molds, in which the pattern is impressed in the sand and withdrawn, and the molten metal is then poured in and finds its level. (b) Close molds, or molds in two parts called the drag and the case (or cope), forming together a two-part flask, one part being placed over the other, and each being impressed with one half of the matrix or pattern. See flask, 2. (c) Loam-molds, or molds built up with a core of brickwork or other material, and covered with founders' loam. As in the case of open molds, with close molds a pattern, usually of wood, is used, being impressed one half at a time in the two parts of the flask or molding-box, which, when put together so as to correspond, form the mold. Loam-molds are used especially in making large hollow castings, and do not require a pattern. These molds are of every shape and size, from molds for kettles and water-pipes to those for engine-cylinders and great cannon. Fine molds for making castings of insects, flowers, and other delicate objects are formed by suspending the object in a box by means of wires and covering it with plaster of Paris. When set the mold is heated until the object is burned, and the ash is then blown out, leaving the original shape in the mold. Another method is to fashion the figure in wax, bed it in plaster or clay, and then melt out the wax (cire perdu). In making plaster casts of parts of the human body, or of sculptors' models, the original mold requires to be cut to remove it from the object, and the parts are afterward fitted together. Gelatin, papier maché, and sulphur are also used for making certain kinds of molds. The type-mold of type-founders is of steel in two pieces, making right and left halves, on the top of which, when conjoined, the matrix is attached. Every body of type has its special mold, which can be used for that body only, but the mold is made adjustable for the varying widths of type.

Details of Type-mold.
a, the two halves of the mold united but without the matrix, showing the face of the type H as formed in the mold; b, one half of the mold; c, the other half of the mold, showing the body of the letter H in position; d, the matrix relatively enlarged, showing the face of the letter H.

4. In terra-cotta work, the plaster forms used in making terra-cotta architectural ornaments. They are usually in a number of parts, and when the clay is set sufficiently the mold is carefully taken apart. Similar molds are used also for glass, pottery, and waxwork. 5. In stucco-work, a templet or former for shaping cornices, centerpieces, etc.—6. In paper-manufacture, a frame with a bottom of wire netting which is filled with paper-pulp that in draining away leaves a film of pulp which is formed into a sheet of paper.—7. In ship-building, the pattern used in working out the frames of a vessel.—8. A former or matrix used in various household operations, as an incised stamp of wood for shaping and ornamenting pats of butter, or a form of metal, earthenware, etc., for giving shape to jellies, blanc-mange, ices, etc.—9. In cookery, a dish shaped in a mold: as, a mold of jelly.

We had preserved plums to the mould of rice. Dickens.

10. In anat., same as fontanelle, 2.—11. Among gold-beaters, a number of pieces of vellum or like substance, laid over one another, between which the leaves of gold are laid for the final beating.—Elastic mold. See elastic.—Gold-beaters' mold. See gold-beater.

mold[4], mould[4] (mōld), v. t. [< OF. moller, moler, F. mouler = Sp. Pg. moldar, < L. modulari, measure; from the noun: see mold[4], n.] 1. To form into a particular shape; shape; model; fashion; cast in or as in a mold; specifically, to form articles of clay upon a whirling table or potter's wheel, or in molds which open and close like those employed in metal-casting.

Though he have been or seemed somewhat harsh heretofore, yet now you shall find he is new moulded.
Sherley, quoted in Bradford's Plymouth Plantation, p. 229.

If these two things be supposed, that a man set before him honest and good ends, and again, that he be resolute, constant, and true unto them, it will follow that he shall mould himself into all virtue at once.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii. 300.

Did I request thee, Maker, from my clay
To mould me man? Milton, P. L., x. 744.

2. In ship-building, to give the required depth and outline to, as ships' timbers.—Diamond-molded glass. See glass.—Molded breadth, the greatest breadth of a ship, measured to the outside of the frame-timbers.—Molded charcoal. See charcoal.—Molded glass, glass which is blown in a mold. The mold fits around the melted glass held on the end of the pontil, and is adapted for easy and rapid adjustment.—Molded wood, wood embossed in designs by having the pattern stamped deeply on the end grain of the wood, this end being then planed down to the bottom of the impression, and soaked in water, when the compressed parts swell up into high relief. Medallions and other decorative objects were produced in this way in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

mold[5]†, n. An obsolete form of mole[2]. Levins.

moldability, mouldability (mōl-da-bil'i-ti), n. [< moldable: see -bility.] Capability of being molded.

moldable, mouldable (mōl'da-bl), a. [< mold[4] + -able.] Capable of being molded or formed.

The differences of impressible and not impressible; figurable and not figurable; mouldable and not mouldable.
Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 846.

moldale†, n. [ME., also molde-ale, a funeral feast, < molde, earth (with ref. to burial), + ale, a drinking, a feast: see mold[1] and ale. Cf. moldmeat. Hence mulled ale: see mulled.] A funeral feast. Prompt. Parv., p. 341.

Moldavian (mol-dā'vi-an), a. and n. [< Moldavia (see def.) + -an.] I. a. Of or relating to Moldavia, a former principality of eastern Europe, now forming part of the kingdom of Rumania.—Moldavian balm, a blue-flowered labiate herb, Dracocephalum Moldavica, cultivated in flower-gardens, and of some culinary use.—Moldavian cloak, a long outer garment worn by women about 1850, having a cape in front covering the arms and serving on each side as a kind of sleeve.

II. n. A native or an inhabitant of Moldavia.

mold-board (mōld'bōrd), n. 1. The curved board or metal-plate in a plow, which turns over the furrow.—2. In founding, the board on which the pattern for a mold is laid; a follow-board.

mold-box (mōld'boks), n. A box used in casting steel under pressure for the manufacture of guns, etc. As devised by Sir Joseph Whitworth, this is a cylindrical box in which melted crucible steel or Siemens-Martin process steel is subjected to a hydrostatic pressure of 6,000 pounds per square inch. Two closely fitting hoops of steel of ample strength are fitted on the interior with cast-iron lags having vertical channels on the faces fitted to the hoops, and numerous channels leading from the vertical channels to the interior of the mold-box. The interior surfaces of the lags are lined with refractory sand. A central core of cast-iron faced with refractory sand, and provided with horizontal and vertical channels like the lags, is erected in the box, leaving an annular space into which the metal is run. By means of a hydraulic press an annular piston or plunger is driven down upon the upper surface of the molten metal. The gases which would otherwise be retained in the metal are thus forced out, escaping through the channels in the lags and the core.

mold-candle (mōld′kan″dl), n. A candle formed in a mold, as distinguished from a dipped candle or dip. See dip, n., 2.

mold-cistern (mōld′sis″tèrn), n. In sugar making: (a) The vat which receives the drippings from the sugar-loaves. (b) A tank in which the molds are washed after use. E. H. Knight.

molder[1], moulder[1] (mōl′dėr), v. [A freq. form of mold[1], mould[1].] I. intrans. 1. To turn to mold or dust by natural decay; waste away by a gradual separation of the component particles, especially without the presence of water; crumble.

> The ninth [means to induce and accelerate putrefaction] is by the interchange of heat and cold, or wet and dry; as we see in the mouldering of earth in frosts and sunne.
> Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 337.
>
> To Dust must all that Heav'n of Beauty come!
> And must Pastora moulder in the Tomb!
> Congreve, Death of Queen Mary.
>
> The brass and marble remain, yet the inscriptions are effaced by time, and the imagery moulders away.
> Locke, Human Understanding, II. x. 5.

2. To be diminished; waste away gradually.

> If he had sat still the enemy's army would have mouldered to nothing. Clarendon, Great Rebellion.

II. trans. To turn to dust; crumble; waste.

> These rocks [falling from mountain-tops] . . . when their foundations have been mouldered with age.
> Addison, Remarks on Italy.

molder[1]†, moulder[1]† (mōl′dėr), n. [< molder[1], v.] Mold; clay.

> Not that we are privy to the eternall counsel of God, but for that by sense of our ayrie bodies we have a more refined faculty of foreseeing than men possibly can have that are chained to such heavie earthly moulder.
> Nashe, Pierce Penilesse, p. 85. (Halliwell.)

molder[2], moulder[2] (mōl′dėr), n. [< ME. moldere*, moldare, mooldare, a former (kneader); < mold[4] + -er[1].] 1. One who molds or forms into shape; specifically, one who is employed in making castings in a foundry.

> Unthinking, overbearing people, who . . . set up for reformers, and new moulders of the constitution.
> Bp. Berkeley, Discourse to Magistrates.

2. In printing, one of a set of electrotyped plates used only for making duplicate electrotypes.—Molders' clamp, flask, etc. See clamp, etc.

moldery (mōl′dėr-i), a. [< molder[1] + -y[1].] Of the nature of or like mold. Loudon.

mold-facing (mōld′fā″sing), n. In iron- and brass-founding: (a) A thin coating of finely pulverized material dusted upon the inside faces of molds, to insure smooth outside surfaces on the castings. For iron, powdered charcoal and millduct, and sometimes plumbago, are used. For brass, peasemeal, powdered soapstone, rottenstone, graphite, and chalk are variously employed. (b) A wash of plumbago and water laid on the faces of a mold by gentle manipulation with a soft brush, and allowed to dry before the cast is made.

moldiness, mouldiness (mōl′di-nes), n. [< moldy[1] + -ness. Cf. moldness.] The state of being moldy; moldy growth; minute fungi. See mold[2].

> His few Greek books a rotten chest contain'd, > Whose covers much of mouldiness complain'd.
> Dryden, tr. of Juvenal's Satires, iii.

molding[1], moulding[1] (mōl′ding), n. [Verbal n. of mold[1], mould[1], v.] The act of covering with mold; mold used to cover the roots of plants.

> When the sprouts [of sugar-cane] are six or eight inches high, it will be necessary to put a gang in to give them a plentiful molding, in order to cover their roots and feed their stems.
> T. Roughley, Jamaica Planter's Guide (1823), p. 335.

★ molding[2], moulding[2] (mōl′ding), n. [Verbal n. of mold[4], mould[4], v.] 1. The process of shaping any plastic substance into a given form, as wax into artistic figures, or clay into bricks.

> For there was never man without our molding,
> Without our stamp upon him, and our justice,
> Left any thing three ages after him
> Good, and his own. Fletcher, Tamer Tamed, iii. 3.

2. Anything cast in a mold, or anything formed as if by a mold.—3. In arch., a member of construction or decoration so treated as to introduce varieties of outline or contour in edges or surfaces, whether on projections or in cavities, such as on cornices, string-courses, bases, door- or window-jambs, lintels, etc. In classical architecture moldings are divided into three classes: the right-lined, as the fillet, tænia, listel, regula; the curved, as the astragal or bead, the torus, the cavetto, the quarter-round, ovolo, and echinus; and the composite, as the ogee, talon, or cyma reversa, the cyma recta or doucine, and the scotia or trochilos, all of which are known by many synonymous names. In Roman architecture all curved moldings are formed of portions of circles, while in Greek architecture they are for the most part formed of some conic section, of which the curve, in good work, is always of extreme refinement. All these moldings are frequently enriched by carving. In the architecture of the middle ages there is very great diversity in the form and arrangement of the moldings. In the Norman style they consist almost entirely of rounds and hollows, variously combined with splays and fillets, a striking peculiarity of this style being the recurrence of moldings broken into zigzag lines. In the succeeding English style, the early Pointed, the moldings are much lighter and more boldly cut. In the Decorated style of the fourteenth century there is still greater diversity, and this period is further characterized by the introduction of the roll-molding, and another termed the wave-molding. In the Perpendicular style large and often shallow hollows prevail, and the moldings are in general of flatter profile and less effective than those of earlier periods. The moldings of medieval architecture are very commonly sculptured with surface-ornament beautiful in design and elaborate in workmanship. See cuts under dog-tooth, double-cone, egg, indented, keel-molding, lozenge, fret[3], 3.—Belt-molding, a molding passing entirely around the interior of a passenger-car, directly above the windows. Car-Builder's Dict.—Dovetail-molding. See dovetail.—Embattled molding. See embattled.—Nail-headed molding. See nail-headed.—Nebuly molding, in arch., a molding in Romanesque architecture the edge of which forms an undulating or waved line: introduced in corbel-tables and archivolts.—Raking molding, a molding inclined from the horizontal or vertical, as that which often follows the line of a staircase, the rail of an ascending balustrade, etc.

molding-bed (mōl′ding-bed), n. A machine for working rectilinear moldings in marble. A traveling frame carries revolving grinders, and is adjustable vertically by a screw to the height required by the thickness of the marble. The grinders are solid cylinders of cast-iron, and are counterparts of the required moldings.

molding-board (mōl′ding-bōrd), n. Same as mold-board.

molding-box (mōl′ding-boks), n. In foundry-work, a molding-flask.

molding-crane (mōl′ding-krān), n. A crane adapted for use in a foundry in handling molds and flasks; a foundry-crane.

molding-cutter (mōl′ding-kut″èr), n. A tool working on the principle of the plane-iron or cutter of a hand-plane, the edge of which is formed by a bevel on one side of the tool. The edges of molding-cutters are formed to correspond with the outline of the cross-sections of the moldings to be cut, each cutter being adapted to only one pattern of molding. Thus, to cut a molding of semicircular cross-section, the edge of the cutter must be a semicircle of the exact size of the molding. Such moldings were formerly cut by hand-planing, but this is now almost entirely superseded by power-planing machines with rotary cutters.

molding-file (mōl′ding-fīl), n. A file with a concave face used for finishing molded surfaces.

molding-flask (mōl′ding-flask), n. 1. Same as flask, 2.—2. In dentistry, a jointed receptacle in three parts, in which the vulcanite model and plaster mold are secured in making dentures ready for the muffle. E. H. Knight.

molding-frame (mōl′ding-frām), n. In founding, the templet by which an object is shaped in loam-molding. E. H. Knight.

molding-hole (mōl′ding-hōl), n. In founding, an excavation in the foundry-floor in which castings of large size are made.

molding-loam (mōl′ding-lōm), n. A mixture of clay and sand employed by founders in constructing molds for loam-molding.

molding-machine (mōl′ding-ma-shēn″), n. 1. In wood-working, one of a class of high-speed power-machines for planing, recessing, shaping, molding, profiling, and paneling wood. Such machines occupy in wood-working much the same position as the milling-machine in metal-work, as both operate by means of revolving cutters. In molding-machines all the work is performed by revolving cutter-heads having variously shaped knives. These cutters are used singly, as in some panel-machines, and project through the table on which the work is laid, or they are arranged in gangs and series so that the wood in passing through the machine is exposed successively to all the cutters. By this gang-system of cutters it is possible to cut moldings and edgings of the most complicated pattern. One form of the machine has the cutters between the cutter-arbor bearings, and is known as a matching-machine or wood-planing machine, or an inside-molding machine. In another form the cutters project up through the table and are arranged to work upon the inside edges of moldings. This type is known as the edge-molding machine. Sometimes called carving-machine, variety-planer, or relief-paneling machine.

2. A machine for making molding from an artificial composition. The material is forced from a hopper by a compressor, is carried by an apron beneath a die-wheel, and after being shaped by this it is delivered on a table.

3. In sheet-metal working, a rolling-machine with shaped rollers of which one is the counterpart of the other, for molding sheet-metal into shape for cornices, balusters, etc.—4. In founding: (a) A machine for making loam-molds in flasks from small patterns carried by the machine. (b) A gear-molding machine.—Gear-molding machine, an apparatus for molding large gear-wheels from a pattern of a small section of the gear, as of two teeth and the interdental space.—Stone-molding machine, a machine for working stone moldings. It resembles one form of stone-saw, but differs from it in having the frame which carries the revolving grinder adjustable, by means of a screw beneath, to the thickness of the slab. The grinder is kept constantly supplied with moist sand.—Surface-molding machine, a form of molding-machine with double-edged cutters and a rapid reverse motion. It is used to cut scrolls and plain or molded designs on the surface of solid wood, to rout such work as ends of pews and stairs, to form grooves for inlaid work, to make tracings for carving, etc.

molding-mill (mōl′ding-mil), n. A sawmill or shaping-mill for timber.

molding-plane (mōl′ding-plān), n. In joinery, a plane used in forming moldings; a match-plane. Such planes have various patterns or convex and concave soles for making the different parts of moldings, as hollows and rounds.

molding-plow (mōl′ding-plou), n. A plow with two mold-boards to throw the soil to both sides at once; a ridging-plow. It is used in forming ridges, in hilling potatoes, etc.

molding-sand (mōl′ding-sand), n. A mixture of sand and loam of which molds for use in a foundry are made.

molding-saw (mōl′ding-sâ), n. A circular saw or combination of circular saws for cutting out blocks approximating to the shapes of ornamental moldings. The molding is finished by cutters formed to the exact curve.

molding-table (mōl′ding-tā″bl), n. A table on which a potter molds his ware. It has a trug or trough in which the workman moistens his hands, and a block-and-stock board on which he places the tile-mold. There are also four pegs driven into the table at the corners of the block-and-stock board, to sustain the mold and regulate the thickness of the tile.

mold-loft (mōld′lôft), n. A large room in a ship-building yard in which the several parts of a ship are drawn out in their proper dimensions from the construction drawings. Also called modeling-loft.

> [The] various problems [of laying-off] are solved upon the floor of a building known as the Mould Loft, where the drawings furnished by the designer are transferred in chalk lines in full size, and then by the aid of geometry, and in the manner discussed in the following pages, the draughtsman determines and draws in the shapes of the various components of the frame. Moulds are made to the lines, and with these moulds and other data furnished by the draughtsman the workmen are enabled to trim the timbers, or bend the angle-irons, and place such marks upon them as shall leave nothing but the putting together and fastening them in their places in order to construct the frame of the ship.
> Thearle, Naval Architecture, § 1.

moldmeat†, n. [OSc. mouldmete; < mold[1] + meat[1]. Cf. moldale.] A funeral feast.

moldness†, mouldness†, n. [ME. mowlednes; < mold[2], a., + -ness.] Moldiness. Cath. Ang., p. 244.

mold-stone (mōld′stōn), n. The jamb-stone of a door or window.

mold-turner (mōld′tėr″nėr), n. A maker of metal frames or shapes. Simmonds.

moldwarp, mouldwarp (mōld′wârp), n. [Also molewarp; cf. dial. molwart, moodiewart, moudiewart, etc.; < ME. moldwarp, moldwerp, moldewarp, moldewerp, molewarpe, molwarpe (= MD. molworp, mulworp, molworm, D. molworp = MLG. molworm, LG. mulworp, molworm = OHG. moltwerf, multwurf, moltwerfe, mūwerf, MHG. moltwerf, moltwerfe, mulwerf, mulwelf, murwerf, G. maulwurf = Icel. moldvarpa = Sw. mullvad = Dan. muldvarp), < AS. molde, the earth, dust, + weorpan, throw: see mold[1] and warp. Cf. mole[2].] The mole, Talpa europæa. See mole[2]. > Massinger, Maid of Honour, iv. 1.

moldy[2], mouldy[2] (mōl′di), n.; pl. moldies, mouldies (-diz). [See moldwarp, mole[2].] A mole-catcher. [Prov. Eng.]

moldy-hill, mouldy-hill (mōl′di-hil), n. [Also dial. moadie-hill; < moldy[2], mouldy[2], + hill[1].] A mole-hill. [Prov. Eng.]

> He has pitch'd his sword in a moodie-hill,
> And he has leap'd twenty lang feet and three.
> Græme and Bewick (Child's Ballads, III. 84).

moldy-rat, mouldy-rat (mōl′di-rat), n. A mole. [Prov. Eng.]

mole[1] (mōl), n. [Also dial. (Sc.) mail (in this form mixed with mail[1], ult. < L. macula, a spot), also by some confusion maul, moil; < ME. mole, mool, < AS. māl, māl, a spot, = OHG. mole[2] (mōl), n. [Early mod. E. also mool, moule, mowle, mold, < ME. mol, molde, molle (= D. mol = MLG. mol, mul), appar. an abbr. of orig. molewarp, prop. moldwarp. Such abbreviation so early as in the ME. period is not satisfactorily explained.] 1. An insectivorous mammal of the family Talpidæ (which see for technical characters). There are at least 7 genera of moles, of which Talpa, Mogera, Parascaptor, and Scaptochirus are confined to the Old World, and Condylura, Scalops, and Scapanus to America. The several species are much alike in general appearance and habits, all living under ground, where they burrow with wonderful facility, and construct galleries often of great extent and complexity. They are stout thick-set animals, usually 6 or 8 inches long, with very small or rudimentary eyes and ears, sharp snout, no visible neck, strong and highly fossorial fore feet, and short tail. They feed chiefly upon earthworms. The best-known is the common mole of Europe, Talpa europæa. The Japanese mole is Mogera wogura. All the American moles differ decidedly from those of Europe and Asia; they are called shrew-moles, and the commonest is Scalops aquaticus, of wide distribution in the United States. The American moles of the genus Scapanus are nearest those of the Old World. There are several species of this genus, the best-known being S. townsendi, confined to western portions of the continent. The star-nosed mole of North America is Condylura cristata. See cuts under the genera Talpa, Scalops, and Condylura.

2. A kind of plow or other implement drawn or driven through the subsoil in making drains; a mole-plow.—Cape mole. (a) The chrysochlore or golden mole of South Africa, Chrysochloris aureus. (b) The rodent bathyergue or mole-rat of South Africa, Bathyergus maritimus.—Golden mole. Same as Cape mole (a).—Oregon mole, a large mole, Scapanus townsendi, inhabiting the Pacific States.

mole[2] (mōl), v.; pret. and pp. moled, ppr. moling. [< mole[2], n.] I. trans. 1. To clear of mole-hills. [Prov. Eng.]—2. To burrow or form holes in, as a mole: as, to mole the earth.

II. intrans. To destroy moles. [Prov. Eng.]

mole[3] (mōl), n. [< F. môle (> Russ. mola) = Sp. mole, muelle = Pg. molhe = It. mole, molo (> G. molo), < L. moles, a great mass, a massive structure, esp. of stone, a pier, dam, mole, pile, hence a burden, difficulty, effort, labor. Hence ult. amolish, demolish, emolument, molecule, molest, etc.] 1. A mound or massive work, formed largely of stone, inclosing a harbor or anchorage, to protect it from the violence of the waves.

The foundations of Nero's port are still to be seen. It was altogether artificial, and composed of huge moles running round it, in a kind of circular figure, except where the ships were to enter.
Addison, Remarks on Italy (ed. Bohn), I. 455.

> Bid the broad arch the dangerous flood contain,
> The mole projected break the roaring main.
> Pope, Moral Essays, iv. 200.

2. A form of ancient Roman mausoleum, consisting of a round tower on a square base, insulated, encompassed with columns, and covered with a dome. [Rare.]

mole[4] (mōl), n. [< F. môle = Sp. Pg. It. mola, < L. mola (= Gr. μύλη), a false uterine formation, a particular use of mola, a millstone: see mill[1].] A somewhat shapeless, compact fleshy mass occurring in the uterus, either due to the retention and continued life of the whole or a part of the fetal envelops after the death of the fetus (a maternal or true mole), or being some other body liable to be mistaken for this, as the membrane in membranous dysmenorrhea, or perhaps a polypus (a false mole).—Cystic, hydatid, or vesicular mole, a true mole composed largely of myxomatous growths originating in the chorionic villi.

mole[5] (mōl), n. [< L. mola (= Gr. μύλη), spelt coarsely ground and mixed with salt (mola salsa); cf. mola, a millstone: see mill[1].] Coarse meal mixed with salt, in ancient times used in sacrifices.

> She with the mole all in her handes devout > Stode neare the aulter. Surrey, Æneid, iv.

> Crumble the sacred mole of salt and corn,
> Next in the fire the bags with brimstone burn.
> Dryden, tr. of Virgil's Pastorals, viii.

mole[6]†, v. i. [A ME. var. of mele[3].] To speak.

> This valyant bierne
> Moles to hir mildly with fulle meke wordes.
> Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), l. 3057.

mole-bat (mōl′bat), n. See mole-but.

mole-bout†, n. Same as mole-but.

Bota, a fish that grunteth, called a Mole-bout.
Florio (1598).

mole-but (mōl′but), n. The short sunfish, a typical species of the family Molidæ, technically named Mola mola. Also mole-bat. See cut at Mola.

mole-cast (mōl′kȧst), n. A mole-hill.

mole-catcher (mōl′kach″ėr), n. One whose business is to catch moles.

★mole-cricket (mōl′krik″et), n. A fossorial orthopterous insect of the genus Gryllotalpa: so called from its habit of burrowing in the ground like a mole by means of its large and peculiarly shaped fore legs. There are upward of 20 species, found in various parts of the world; that common in Europe is G. vulgaris, about 1¼ inches long, and of a brown color. It constructs extensive subterranean galleries, cutting through the roots of the plants encountered, and thus doing much damage in gardens. Also called fen-cricket, ★fan-cricket, and sometimes earth-crab.

Mole-cricket (Gryllotalpa borealis).
a, adult, somewhat enlarged; b, anterior tarsus or fore foot, greatly enlarged.

★molecular (mō-lek′ū-lär), a. [= F. moléculaire = Sp. Pg. molecular, < NL. molecularis,* < molecula, a molecule: see molecule.] 1. Relating to molecules; consisting of molecules: as, molecular structure.

The general principle of molecular science . . . finds numerous examples both in inorganic chemistry and in biology. G. T. Ladd, Physiol. Psychology, p. 549.

2. Acting in or by means of the molecules or ultimate physical elements of a substance. Compare molar[2].

Our thoughts are the expression of molecular changes in that matter of life which is the source of our other vital phenomena. Huxley, Physical Basis of Life.

The molecular movements within animals of the simplest class are the digestion of food and the elaboration of the materials of reproduction.
E. D. Cope, Origin of the Fittest, p. 231.

Atomic or molecular heats of bodies. See atomic.—Molecular attraction, that species of attraction which operates upon the molecules or particles of a body, as distinguished from the attraction of gravitation. Cohesion and chemical affinity are instances of molecular attraction.—Molecular force. See force[1].—Molecular weights. See weight.

molecularity (mō-lek-ū-lar′i-ti), n. [< molecular + -ity.] The condition or character of being molecular.

molecularium (mō-lek-ū-lā′ri-um), n. [NL.: see molecular.] An apparatus invented by Berliner for illustrating a number of electrical phenomena on the theory of molecular vibration.

molecularly (mō-lek′ū-lär-li), adv. As regards molecules.

The expansion and contraction of the protoplasm give motion to the prearranged and molecularly unyielding levers of the animal engine. Pop. Sci. Mo., XIII. 567.

★molecule (mol′e-kūl), n. [< F. molécule = Sp. molécula = Pg. molecula = It. molecula, molecola, < NL. molecula, a molecule, dim. of L. moles, a mass: see mole[3].] 1. The smallest mass of any substance which is capable of existing in a separate form—that is, the smallest part into which the substance can be divided without destroying its chemical character (identity). Molecules, however, may break up into smaller electrically charged particles ('ions') to which the conductivity of gases and other phenomena are due. All the physical changes of a body are phenomena which take place without the loss of identity of the substance itself, and concern the relations of the molecules among themselves. Hence the molecule is taken as the physical unit. A homogeneous body is regarded as made up of similar molecules, whose relations determine its physical qualities, and particularly its state as a gas, liquid, or solid. A gas, according to the kinetic theory of gases, is composed of molecules darting about in paths which are very nearly rectilinear through the greater part of their lengths. Liquids are supposed to be composed of molecules which wander about, but have not nearly rectilinear paths; while solids are believed to be composed of molecules bound together by cohesion and moving in quasi-orbital paths. A molecule of any substance is conceived as made up of one or more atoms, whose relations to each other are considered in chemistry. (See atom.) The exact nature of the molecules is still largely a matter of hypothesis, but as regards their size Sir William Thomson has reached a quasi-definite conclusion as follows: "If a drop of water were magnified to the size of the earth, the molecules or granules would each occupy spaces greater than those filled by small shot and smaller than those occupied by cricket-balls."

A molecule may consist of several distinct portions of matter held together by chemical bonds. . . . So long as the different portions do not part company, but travel together in the excursions made by the molecule, our theory calls the whole connected mass a single molecule.
Clerk Maxwell, Heat, p. 286.

The molecule of any substance is, by some chemists, defined as being the smallest portion of that substance to which can be attributed all the chemical properties of the substance; by others, as the smallest portion which, so long as the substance is chemically unchanged, keeps together without complete separation of its parts.
Encyc. Brit., XVI. 611.

We have, I believe, what we may almost call a new chemistry, some day to be revealed to us by means of photographic records of the behaviour of molecules.
J. N. Lockyer, Spect. Anal., p. 109.

Hence—2. A very small particle or bit of something; a particle; an atom. [Colloq.]—3. In ornith., the tread or cicatricula of a fecundated ovum. [Rare.]—Constituent molecule, a molecule which is united with others unlike itself, as some of the ingredients of a heterogeneous body.—Integrant molecule. See integrant.—Organic molecules, bodies capable of neither generation nor corruption, which were supposed by Buffon to account for the properties of living matter.=Syn. 1. Atom, etc. See particle.

mole-eyed (mōl'īd), a. 1. Having very small eyes, like a mole's; having imperfect sight; purblind.

But this mole-eyed, dragon-tailed abomination [a crocodile] . . . was utterly loathsome.
G. W. Curtis, Nile Notes of a Howadji, p. 75.

Hence—2. Figuratively, short-sighted; taking a narrow view of things: as, mole-eyed parsimony.

mole-heap†, n. Same as mole-hill. Minsheu.

mole-hill (mōl'hil), n. A little hill, hillock, mound, or ridge of earth thrown up by moles in burrowing underground. When moles are working near the surface in search of food, the hills become tortuous ridges which may be traced sometimes for many yards with little or no interruption.

A devil of pride
Ranges in airy thoughts to catch a star,
Whiles ye grasp mole-hills. Ford, Fancies, i. 3.

The glass through which an envious eye doth gaze
Can eas'ly make a mole-hill mountain seem.
P. Fletcher, Upon his Brother's Book, Christ's Victory.

To make a mountain of (or out of) a mole-hill, to magnify an insignificant matter.

mole-hole (mōl'hōl), n. The burrow of a mole.

molendinaceous (mō-len-di-nā'shius), a. [< LL. molendinum, a mill-house (< L. molendus, gerundive of molere, grind: see mill[1]), + -aceous.] Like a windmill; resembling the sails of a windmill: applied to fruits or seeds which have many wings. [Rare.]

molendinarious (mō-len-di-nā'ri-us), a. [< LL. molendinarius: see molendinary.] Same as molendinaceous.

molendinary (mō-len'di-nā-ri), a. [< LL. molendinarius, < molendinum, a mill-house: see molendinaceous.] Relating to a mill; acting as a miller. [In the quotation the word is intentionally pedantic.]

Dismount, then, O lovely Molinara, unless thou wouldst rather that I should transport thee on horseback to the house of thy molendinary father. Scott, Monastery, xxix.

mole-plant (mōl'plant), n. Same as mole-tree.

mole-plow (mōl'plou), n. A plow having a pointed iron shoe secured to the end of a standard, used in making a deep drain for water.

mole-rat (mōl'rat), n. 1. A myomorphic rodent quadruped of the family Spalacidæ (which see for technical characters): so called from its resemblance to a mole in appearance and habits. The mole-rats are stout-bodied rodents, with short, strong limbs (of which the fore ones are fossorial), short or rudimentary tail, and minute or rudimentary eyes and ears. They live under ground and burrow very extensively. All belong to the Old World. The best-known species is Spalax typhlus of Europe and Asia. Others are Indian and African, of the genera Heterocephalus and Rhizomys. The bathyergues are mole-rats of the subfamily Bathyerginæ, inhabiting Africa, as the strand mole-rat, Bathyergus maritimus, and species of the genera Heliophobus and Georychus.

Mole-rat (Spalax typhlus).

2. A fossorial murine rodent of the family Muridæ and subfamily Siphneinæ. It resembles the preceding superficially and in habits to some extent. These mole-rats are confined to the palearctic region, where they are represented by the genera Siphneus and Ellobius. The zokor, S. aspalax, is the best-known.

3. The Australian duck-mole or duck-billed platypus, Ornithorhynchus paradoxus.

mole-shrew (mōl'shrö), n. 1. An American short-tailed shrew, of the family Soricidæ and genus Blarina, somewhat resembling a small mole. B. brevicauda is the largest and best-known species, common in the United States and Canada. See cut under Blarina.

2. Any American mole; a shrew-mole. All the American Talpidæ (genera Scalops, Scapanus, and Condylura) differ from the Old World moles, and somewhat approach shrews in character. The name is also applied to Neurotrichus gibbsi, which is of a different subfamily (Mygalinæ).

moleskin (mōl'skin), n. and a. I. n. 1. The skin of a mole.—2. A kind of fustian, double-twilled and extra strong, and cropped before dyeing. Compare beavertеen, 2.

II. a. Made of or resembling moleskin: as, a moleskin vest; a moleskin purse.

mole-spade (mōl'spād), n. A spade or spud used in prodding for moles, or in setting traps for them.

Poore Menaphon neither asked his swaynes for his sheepe, nor tooke his mole-spade on his necke to see his pastures. Greene, Menaphon, p. 33.

molest (mō-lest'), v. t. [< ME. molesten, < OF. molester, F. molester = Sp. Pg. molestar = It. molestare, < L. molestare, trouble, annoy, molest, < mōlestus, troublesome, < mōles, a burden, difficulty, labor, trouble: see mole[3].] To trouble; disturb; harass; vex; meddle with injuriously.

But how this cas doth Troilus moleste,
That may none erthly mannes tonge seye.
Chaucer, Troilus, iv. 880.

My Father was afterwards most unjustly and spitefully molested by yt jeering judge Richardson, for repreeving the execution of a woman. Evelyn, Diary, Nov. 3, 1633.

The moping Owl does to the Moon complain
Of such as, wand'ring near her secret bower,
Molest her ancient, solitary reign. Gray, Elegy.

=Syn. Annoy, Plague, etc. (see tease), incommode, discommode, inconvenience.

molest† (mō-lest'), n. [< molest, v. Cf. molestie.] Trouble.

Thus clogg'd with love, with passions, and with grief,
I saw the country life had least molest.
Greene, Song of a Country Swain, in The Mourning Garment.

molestation (mol-es- or mō-les-tā'shon), n. [= F. molestation, < ML. molestatio(n-)*, < L. molestare, trouble: see molest, v.] 1. The act of molesting.—2. The state of being molested; annoyance; vexatious interference.

The knight and his companion, having reached the castle, now passed the bridge, and entered the gate without molestation.
Hoole, tr. of Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, xiv., note 8.

3. In Scots law, the troubling or harassing of one in the possession of his lands. An action of molestation arises chiefly in questions of commonty or of controverted marches or land-boundaries. = Syn. 1. See tease.

molester (mō-les'tėr), n. One who molests, disturbs, or annoys.

Surely to every good and peaceable man it must in nature needs be a hateful thing to be the displeaser and molester of thousands. Milton, Church-Government, ii., Pref.

molestful (mō-lest'fûl), a. [< molest + -ful.] Troublesome; annoying; harassing.

But that [pride] which breaketh out to the disturbance and vexation of others is hated as molestfull and mischievous. Barrow, Works, I. xxii.

molestie†, n. [ME., < OF. molestie = Sp. Pg. It. molestia, < L. molestia, troublesomeness, trouble, < molestus, troublesome: see molest, n.] Trouble; distress.

In this manere he ne geteth hym nat suffisaunce that power forleteth and that moleste [var. molestie] prikketh. Chaucer, Boëthius, iii. prose 9.

molestious (mō-les'chus), a. [< molestic + -ous.] Troublesome; annoying.

molet†, n. A Middle English form of mullet[1].

mole-track (mōl'trak), n. The track or course of a mole under ground.

mole-tree (mōl'trē), n. A biennial plant, caper-spurge (Euphorbia Lathyris), considered efficacious in clearing land of moles. Its seeds have been used as a cathartic. Also mole-plant.

molette (mō-let'), n. [OF.: see mullet[2].] In her., same as mullet[2].

molewarp, n. See moldwarp.

moley, a. See moly[1].

moleyne†, n. A Middle English form of mullen.

moli (mō'li), n. [Native name.] A small tree, Dracæna Schizantha, growing in elevated regions in the Somali country, Africa. It yields a sort of dragon's-blood, said not to be exported, yet resembling, if not identical with, that known as drop dragon's-blood, attributed to Dracæna Draco of Socotra.

A resin of acidulous flavor obtained from the moli tree (Dracæna Schizantha). Sci. Amer., N. S., LV. 344.

Molidæ (mol'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Mola + -idæ.] A family of gymnodont plectognath fishes, of the superfamily Moloidea; the sunfishes, headfishes, mole-buts, or moloids. They have a compressed-oblong body, longer than high, and a posterior marginal or caudal fin between the dorsal and anal, supported by corresponding interspinal bones (in the adult at least 4 or 5 above and 8 or 9 below) and connected with the posterior surfaces of the neural and hemal spines of the last complete (typically 16th) vertebra. The family contains several fishes of remarkable appearance, whose body ends behind so abruptly that it seems as if cut off. The best-known, Mola mola, attains great size, sometimes weighing a thousand pounds; it is best known by the name of sunfish. Other species, belonging to two different genera, are smaller. The family is also named Orthagoriscidæ, and is synonymous with the subfamily Cephalinæ. See cut under Mola, 2.

Molièresque (mō-lyãr-esk'), a. [< Molière (see def.) + -esque.] Pertaining to or resembling Molière (Jean Baptiste Poquelin, called Molière, 1622–73), the greatest comic writer of France, or his plays.

Crispin and Turcaret are unquestionably Molièresque, though they are perhaps more original in their following of Molière than any other plays that can be named.
Encyc. Brit., XIV. 478.

molimen (mō-lī'men), n. [< L. molīmen, great effort, < moliri, toil, < moles, a burden, difficulty: see mole[3].] Great effort or endeavor; specifically, in physiol., extraordinary effort made in the performance of any function: as, the menstrual molimen.

moliminous (mō-lim'i-nus), a. [< L. molīmen (-min-), great effort, + -ous.] 1. Made with great effort or endeavor.—2†. Of grave import; momentous.

Prophesies of so vast and moliminous concernment to the world. Dr. H. More, Mystery of Godliness, p. 281.

moliminously (mō-lim'i-nus-li), adv. In a moliminous or laborious and unwieldy manner. See the quotation under cumbersomely. [Rare.]

Molina (mō-lī'nä), n. pl. [NL., < Mola + -ina[2].] Günther's third group of Gymnodontes: same as the family Molidæ.

moline (mō'lin), n. and a. [< LL. molinus, pertaining to a mill, molina, a mill, < L. mola, millstone, mill: see mill[1].] I. n. The crossed iron sunk in the center of the upper millstone, for receiving the spindle fixed in the lower stone; a mill-rynd.

Cross Moline.

II. a. In her., resembling a moline.—Cross moline. See crossl.

Molinia (mō-lin'i-ä), n. [NL. (Schrank, 1789), named after J. Molina, a writer upon Chilian plants and animals.] A genus of grasses of the tribe Festuceæ and the subtribe Eragrosteæ, characterized by an elongated narrow panicle, small spikelets with from two to four flowers, and awnless glumes, the empty ones being slightly smaller than the flowering ones. There is but a single species, M. cærulea, found throughout Europe, and variously named blue or purple melic-grass, purple moor-grass, and Indian grass. It is a rather coarse stiff perennial, often three feet high, having narrow flat leaves, which are chiefly radical and form large tufts. It is common in woods, on moors, and in wet heathy places, but is of little agricultural value.

Molinism (mō'li-nizm), n. [< Molina (see def.) + -ism.] The doctrine, propounded in 1588 by Luis Molina, a celebrated Spanish Jesuit, that the efficacy of divine grace depends simply on the will which accepts it—that grace is a free gift to all, but that the consent of the will is requisite in order that grace may be efficacious.

Molinist[1] (mō'li-nist), n. [< Molina (see Molinism) + -ist.] One who holds the opinions of Molina in respect to grace, free will, and predestination. See Molinism.

Molinist[2] (mō'li-nist), n. [< Molinos (see def.) + -ist.] A quietist, or follower of Miguel de Molinos (1627–96), who taught the direct relationship between the soul and God.

moliture (mol'i-tūr), n. [< ML. molitura, a grinding, < L. molere, grind: see mill[1]. Cf. multure.] A fee paid in kind for the use of a mill; multure. Davies.

This [the Bishop of Rome's] claim of universal power and authority doth bring more moliture to their mill.
Abp. Bramhall, Works, II. 159.

Moll[1] (mol), n. [Also Mall, Mal (also dim. Molly, Mollie); a reduced form of Mary. It occurs with dim. -kin in malkin, mawkin.] 1. A familiar form of the feminine name Mary.—2. [l. c.] A female companion not bound by ties of marriage, but often a life-mate: a word in common use among navvies, costermongers, and the like. [Eng.]—Moll Thompson's brand, M. T. (i. e. empty): applied to an empty jug, decanter, bottle, or other vessel for liquor. [Colloq. and jocular.]

moll[2] (mol), a. [< L. mollis, neut. molle, soft.] In music, minor: as, C moll, or C minor.

molla, mollah (mol'ä), n. [Also moolah, moollah, mulla, mullah; < Turk. Pers. molla, mevla = Hind. maulī, maulavi, < Ar. maulā, a dignitary, judge, etc., master, lit. patron] 1. A Mohammedan title of honor or compliment given to various religious dignitaries, as heads of orders, and others exercising functions relating to the sacred law, as well as to students of that law. It is not conferred by formal authority, but is an expression of public respect, like master.— 2. A superior judge of the Moslem sacred law.

The nomination [of the mufti of Constantinople] must fall on one of the mollahs, who form the upper stratum of the hierarchy of ulema. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 631.

mollet, n. A Middle English form of mull[1].

mollemoke, n. Same as mallemuck.

Molles (mol'ēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of L. mollis, soft. Cf. mollusk.] In Lamarck's classification (1801–12), an order of Vermes, containing the tapeworms and flukes.

molleton (mol'e-ton), n. [F., < mollet, dim. of mou, mol, soft, < L. mollis, soft.] Swanskin; a kind of woolen blanketing used by printers as an elastic impression-surface. Simmonds.

mollewellet, n. [ME.; origin obscure. Cf. milwell.] The sea-calf. Nominale MS. (Halliwell.) moll-hern (mol'hèrn), n. The common European heron, Ardea cinerea. [Local, Eng.]

Mollia (mol'i-ạ), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of L. mollis, soft: see moll[2], Molles.] In Lamarck's classification (1801–12), an order of his class Radiaria, containing the acalephs.

mollicity (mo-lis'i-ti), n. [Irreg. < L. mollities, softness (see mollities), + -ity.] Softness; mollities.

mollie (mol'i), n. [Abbr. of mallemaroking. Cf. molly[2].] A meeting of ship-captains held on board one of several whaling-ships when ice-bound in company. See the quotation. [Naut. slang.]

Whenever the whaling fleet is stopped for a number of days in the ice, it is the practice for the captains to assemble on board one or the other of the ships to discuss the prospects of the season's catch. These interviews are called Mollies, and are announced by a bucket hoisted as a signal at the fore-royal masthead. . . . Generally speaking, a Mollie means making a night of it.
Schley and Soley, Rescue of Greely, p. 183.

mollient (mol'i-ẹnt), a. [= Sp. moliente, < L. mollien(t-)s, ppr. of mollire, soften, < mollis, soft: see moll[2].] Softening; emollient; soothing. Bailey, 1727.

molliently (mol'i-ẹnt-li), adv. With softening or soothing effect.

mollifiable (mol'i-fī-ạ-bl), a. [= Sp. molificable = Pg. mollificavel; as mollify + -able.] Capable of being mollified, softened, or soothed. Ash.

mollification (mol″i-fi-kā'shọn), n. [< F. mollification = Pr. mollificacio = Sp. molificación = Pg. mollificação = It. mollificazione, < ML. mollificatio(n-), < LL. mollificare, soften: see mollify.] 1. The act of mollifying or softening.

For induration, or mollification, it is to be enquired what will make metals harder and harder, and what will make them softer and softer.
Bacon, Physiological Remains.

2. Pacification; an appeasing; something that will soothe.

Some mollification for your giant, sweet lady.
Shak., T. N., i. 5. 218.

mollifier (mol'i-fī-ėr), n. One who or that which mollifies. Bacon.

mollify (mol'i-fī), v.; pret. and pp. mollified, ppr. mollifying. [< F. mollifier = Pr. mollificar = Sp. molificar = Pg. mollificar = It. mollificare, < LL. mollificare, soften, < mollificus, making soft, < L. mollis, soft, + facere, make: see -fy.] I. trans. 1. To soften; make soft or tender.

When they haue killed a great beast, they cut out all the veines and sinewes . . . and likewise all the Suet: which done, they diue them in water to mollifie them.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 213.

They have not been closed, neither bound up, neither mollified with ointment. Isa. i. 6.

2. To soothe; mitigate; appease; pacify; calm or quiet.

All things tending to the preservation of his life and health, or to the mollifying of his cares, he [a king religious and zealous in God's cause] procureth.
Raleigh, Hist. World, V. ii. 3.

Chiron mollify'd his cruel mind
With art, and taught his warlike hands to wind
The silver strings of his melodious lyre.
Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Art of Love, i.

3. To make less harsh; qualify; tone down; moderate; abate.

Mince the sin and mollify damnation with a phrase.
Dryden.

They would . . . sooner prevail with the houses to mollify their demands. Clarendon, Great Rebellion.

4. To induce or incline by making tender.

If it wrought no further good in him, it was that he, in despight of himselfe, withdrewe himselfe from harkening to that which might mollifie his hardened heart.
Sir P. Sidney, Apol. for Poetrie.

I shall deliver words will mollify
The hearts of beasts to spare thy innocence.
Beau. and Fl., Philaster, v. 2.

=Syn. 2 and 3. To mitigate, ease, moderate.—2. To soothe, quiet.

II. intrans. To become soft or tender. [Rare.]

Philanax, feeling his heart more and more mollifying unto her, renewed the image of his dead master in his fancy. Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, iv.

molligut (mol'i-gut), n. The angler or goose-fish, Lophius piscatorius. [Connecticut, U. S.]

molline (mol'in), n. [< L. mollis, soft, + -ine[2].] A base for ointments used in the treatment of skin-diseases. It is essentially a soft soap mixed with excess of fat and glycerin. It is made of caustic potash lye having a specific gravity 1.145, glycerin, and cocoanut-oil, in the proportions 100 parts of oil, 40 parts of lye, and 30 parts of glycerin. The saponification of the oil is carefully performed without heat. The glycerin is afterward thoroughly incorporated by carefully heating and mixing, and the result is a yellowish-white substance of soft consistence containing 17 per cent. of uncombined oil, which is easily removed from the skin by either warm or cold water.

It is necessary to say that no lard is ever used, a substitute being found in a saponaceous preparation which is known under the name of molline.
Lancet, No. 3423, p. 698.

Mollinedia (mol-i-nē'di-ạ), n. [NL. (Ruiz and Pavon, 1794), named after F. Mollinedo, a Spanish chemist and naturalist.] A genus of dicotyledonous apetalous plants of the family Monimiaceæ, type of the tribe Mollinedieæ, characterized by sessile or stalked drupes on a disk-shaped receptacle, from which the perianth falls off like a lid, by subsessile anthers with the cells united into one at the apex, and by an indefinite number of stamens. They are trees or shrubs, with opposite leaves and insignificant green flowers, which are usually diœcious and grow in axillary or subterminal clusters. There are 71 species, natives of Mexico and Central and South America. Several species are highly aromatic, resembling the nutmeg in this respect.

mollinet (mol'i-net), n. [< OF. molinet, F. moulinet (= Sp. molinito), a small mill, dim. of moulin = Sp. molino = Pg. moinho = It. molino, a mill: see mill[1]. Cf. moulinet.] A mill of small size. Bailey, 1731.

mollipilose (mol-i-pī'lōs), a. [< L. mollis, soft, + pilus, a hair: see pilose.] Having soft or fine pelage or plumage, as a quadruped or bird; being fleecy, fluffy, or downy, as hair or feathers.

mollipilosity (mol″i-pī-los'i-ti), n. [< mollipilose + -ity.] Fleeciness or fluffiness of the pelage or plumage of quadrupeds or birds.

mollities (mo-lish'i-ēz), n. [L., softness, < mollis, soft.] In med., softness; softening.—Mollities cerebri, softening of the brain.—Mollities ossium, softening of the bones; osteomalacia.

mollitious (mo-lish'us), a. [< L. mollities, softness: see mollities.] Luxurious.

Here, mollitious alcoves gilt,
Superb as Byzant domes that devils built!
Browning, Sordello, iii.

mollitude (mol'i-tūd), n. [< L. mollitudo, softness, < mollis, soft.] Softness; effeminacy. Campbell.

Molluginеæ (mol-ū-jin'ẹ̄-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Fenzl, 1840), < Mollugo (Mollugin-) + -eæ.] A tribe of dicotyledonous polypetalous plants of the natural order Ficoideæ, characterized by a deeply five-parted calyx, and by having from three to five petals, or sometimes none, and hypogynous or partly perigynous stamens. It includes 14 genera, Mollugo being the type, and about 73 species, the majority of which grow in Africa; but a few genera, as Mollugo and Glinus, are very widely distributed.

Mollugo (mo-lū'gō), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), < L. mollugo, a plant also called lappago, < mollis, soft.] A genus of plants of the natural order Ficoideæ and the tribe Molluginеæ, characterized by a capsular fruit, a three- to five-celled ovary containing many ovules, and stipulate leaves which often appear to be whorled. They are erect or diffuse herbs, usually having forked branches, linear-obovate or spatulate leaves, and inconspicuous greenish flowers in axillary umbel-like cymes. About 13 species have been enumerated, which are common in the warmer parts of the globe. M. verticillata is common throughout the United States. See carpet-weed, and Indian chickweed (under chickweed).

mollusc, n. See mollusk.

Mollusca (mo-lus'kạ), n. pl. [NL., pl. of molluscum, a soft-bodied animal, a mollusk: see mollusk.] One of the leading divisions of invertebrated animals; an extensive series of invertebrates whose bodies are soft, without any jointed legs, and commonly covered with a hard shell in one, two, or more pieces, and whose principal parts are neither segmented into a series of longitudinal rings, as in insects, crustaceans, and worms, nor radiately arranged, as in echinoderms; the mollusks, as the univalve or bivalve shell-fish of ordinary language. Mollusks have no trace of a notochord or urochord, which distinguishes them from certain organisms, as ascidians, formerly classed with them. They are primitively bilaterally symmetrical, or have a right and left "side" along a main axis; this form is best expressed in the chitons, and is evident in bivalves, slugs, etc., but its expression is often obscured by a twisting to which the body is subjected in various univalves, as those whose shells are spiral. (See Isopleura, Anisopleura.) There is always a well-defined alimentary canal, with definite walls. A nervous system is well developed as a set of ganglia with connecting commissures, one characteristic feature of which is the formation of a nervous ring or collar around the gullet, and another is the torsion of the visceral commissures in those forms whose bodies are twisted as above said. (See Euthyneura, Streptoneura.) Most mollusks have a distinct head, which, however, is not apparent in bivalves, leading to a division of headless mollusks (Acephala or Lipocephala). A characteristic organ of Glossophora or mollusks with heads is the odontophore, buccal mass, or lingual ribbon, whose radula serves as a rasping-organ in a mouth otherwise soft and toothless. Various modifications of the radular teeth give rise to several descriptive terms. (See ptenoglossate, rachiglossate, rhipidoglossate, tœnioglossate.) There is always a heart, with a ventricle and at least one auricle, and dorsal in position. Its relative situation with respect to the gills differs in certain groups of mollusks. (See opisthobranchiate, prosobranchiate.) The circulation is double. The respiratory system is branchial, and in some cases, as of snails and slugs, modified for breathing air into a kind of lung. (See Pulmonata, Gasteropoda.) The primitive typical gills are paired organs called ctenidia; but these undergo many modifications, and their function of respiration may be assumed vicariously by other parts of the body not homologous with them. These modifications give rise to the names of many subordinate groups of mollusks, especially of gastropods, besides that of the great series Lamellibranchiata. The renal organs of mollusks are technically called nephridia, or organs of Bojanus. (See cut under Lamellibranchiata.) The sexual organs are developed, either in the same individuals, or in different individuals of opposite sexes. The characteristic organ of locomotion is the foot or podium, a development of the under surface of the body, which may be a broad flat sole (see cut under Gasteropoda), upon which the mollusk creeps, or otherwise shaped. It is often wanting, as in the oyster, or may give rise to a thready byssus by which the animal is rooted, as in the mussel. Forms of the podium give names to most of the leading groups of mollusks, as cephalopods, pteropods, scaphopods, heteropods, gastropods, and pelecypods. A large part of the soft integument of mollusks forms what is called the mantle or pallium, from which the shell, when present, is developed (see integropalliate, sinupalliate), and the impression of the edge of the mantle on the inside of the shell is the pallial line. Some mollusks are entirely naked, or have only a rudimentary and concealed shell, as land-slugs and sea-slugs, and also most of the living cephalopods. The body of cephalopods is strengthened by an internal skeleton, the calamary or cuttlebone, though no mollusk has an articulated internal skeleton. But the great majority of mollusks have a hard shell (whence the old names Testacea, Ostracodermata), of a horny or chitinous or more decidedly calcareous substance. Those whose shell is single are called univalves; those in which it forms a hinged pair of shells are bivalves; but the former may have an additional shelly piece, closing the aperture, the operculum; and the two main valves of the latter may be supplemented by accessory valves (see cut under accessory). Bivalves are the natural group of headless or lamellibranch mollusks; but univalves include several orders, though the word is chiefly used of the numerous and conspicuous gastropods. A few mollusks are technically multivalve; such are the chitons, hence called Polyplacophora, having several segments of the shell in lengthwise series. (See cut under chiton.) Cirripeds used to be considered multivalve mollusks. The shell is usually covered outside with a rough skin or epidermis; inside it may be beautifully lustrous, as with mother-of-pearl. Most mollusks live either in salt, brackish, or fresh water; land-mollusks are mostly found in damp places. Most are locomotory, either by creeping or by swimming; some swim by flapping their shells, others by moving various appendages; many adhere to or even burrow deeply in rocks; a few are parasitic. Some are carnivorous, others herbivorous; most are oviparous, a few ovoviviparous. Many are important as food, and the shells of many are put to useful or ornamental purposes. Certain bivalves furnish pearls. The Mollusca have been variously rated, limited, and classified; at one time the bodies of the animals were differently named from their shells. (See Limax.) (1) The name was originally proposed by Jonston in 1650 for naked cephalopods and for Aplysia, and adopted by Linnæus in 1758 as his second order of Vermes, including similar naked forms and some heterogeneous elements. Linnæus made the Testacea or shelled mollusks his third order of Vermes; and these two groups were combined as a class by Poli in 1791. (2) About 1800 Cuvier made Mollusca the second of his four branches of the animal kingdom, with seven classes, Cephalopoda, Gasteropoda, Pteropoda, Acephala, Brachiopoda, Nuda, and Cirrhopoda (the Nuda being ascidians, and the Cirrhopoda being crustaceans). (3) In Lamarck's system, 1819, Mollusca, as a class, were exclusive of the bivalves (called by him Conchifera), and were divided into five orders, Pteropoda, Gasteropoda, Trachelipoda, Cephalopoda, and Heteropoda. (4) In 1839 Swainson extended Mollusca to all invertebrates except the articulates. (5) The cirripeds having been recognized as crustaceans by Thompson in 1830, and the same naturalist having at the same time investigated the polyzoans, the relation of the latter to the brachiopods led H. Milne-Edwards in 1844 to associate the two Cuvierian groups Brachiopoda and Nuda with the Polyzoa in a division called Molluscoidea (the vertebrate affinities of the Nuda or ascidians not being recognized till much later, in 1866). (6) These dissociations from Mollusca in a former sense have left the group now generally recognized and as above defined. It is regarded as a phylum whose main divisions are classes. These main groups are, in one series of headless mollusks, Acephala or Lipocephala, the single class variously called Conchifera, Lamellibranchiata, Elatobranchia, Pelecypoda, Cormopoda, and by other names of bivalves; and, in another series, Cephalophora, Odontophora, or Glossophora, the four classes Gasteropoda, Scaphopoda, Pteropoda, and Cephalopoda. But from among the gastropods are to be taken the chitons (together with Neomenia and Chætoderma), unless Gasteropoda is used in a very broad sense; and some authors also dissociate the heteropods as a class. See further under the above technical names.

molluscan (mo-lus'kan), a. and n. [< L. molluscus, soft (NL. molluscum, a mollusk), + -an.] I. a. Soft-bodied; pertaining to the Mollusca in any sense, or having their characters; molluscoid; malacozoic: as, a molluscan type.

II. n. A mollusk; a shell-fish; any member of the Mollusca, Molluscoidea, or Malacozoa.

molluscoid (mo-lus'koid), a. and n. [< NL. molluscum, mollusk, + Gr. εἶδος, form.] I. a. 1. Like a mollusk; molluscan or molluscous. — 2. Specifically, as much like a mollusk as a brachiopod or a moss-animal is; pertaining to the Molluscoidea, or having their characters.

II. n. An animal of the group Molluscoidea in any sense.

Molluscoida (mol-us-koi'dä), n. pl. [NL.: see molluscoid.] Same as Molluscoidea.

molluscoidal (mol-us-koi'dal), a. [< molluscoid + -al.] Same as molluscoid.

molluscoidan (mol-us-koi'dan), a. and n. Same as molluscoid.

Molluscoidea (mol-us-koi'dē-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Mollusca + -oidea.] A subkingdom or branch of the animal kingdom related to the Mollusca proper, constituted by Henri Milne-Edwards in 1844 for certain animals which had before been included in Mollusca. (a) At first embracing the classes of brachiopods, polyzoans or bryozoans, and tunicates or ascidians. (b) Restricted to the tunicates and polyzoans. (c) Restricted to the brachiopods and polyzoans. (d) Further restricted to the brachiopods alone.

molluscoidean (mol-us-koi'dē-an), a. and n. I. a. Same as molluscoid, 2.

II. n. Same as molluscoid.

Molluscoides (mol-us-koi'dēz), n. pl. [NL., < Mollusca + -oides.] The original form of the word Molluscoida or Molluscoidea. H. Milne-Edwards, 1844.

molluscous (mo-lus'kus), a. [< mollusk + -ous.] Same as molluscan: as, molluscous softness or flabbiness.

A molluscous man, too suddenly ejected from his long-accustomed groove, where, like a toad imbedded in the rock, he had made his niche exactly fitting to his own shape, presents a wretched picture of helplessness and shiftiness. Saturday Rev.

molluscum (mo-lus'kum), n. [NL., neut. of L. molluscus, soft: see mollusk.] In pathol., a term applied to certain soft cutaneous tumors of slow growth without constitutional symptoms. — Molluscum adenosum. Same as molluscum epitheliale. — Molluscum albinosum. Same as molluscum fibrosum. — Molluscum bodies, peculiar round or oval bodies, sharply defined and of a fatty appearance, seen under the microscope among the contents of the tubercles of molluscum epitheliale. — Molluscum contagiosum. Same as molluscum epitheliale. — Molluscum epitheliale, an epidermic growth in the form of papules and tubercles from the size of a pinhead to that of a pea, or rarely larger, palish and waxy in appearance, and containing molluscum bodies. It has been said on questionable evidence to be contagious. — Molluscum fibrosum, an affection of the skin consisting of sessile, painless, soft or sometimes firm fibromata, from the size of a pea to that of an egg or larger. — Molluscum non-contagiosum or pendulum. Same as molluscum fibrosum. — Molluscum sebaceum or sessile. Same as molluscum epitheliale. — Molluscum simplex. Same as molluscum fibrosum.

mollusk, mollusc (mol'usk), n. [< F. mollusque = Sp. molusco = Pg. It. molusco, < NL. molluscum, a mollusk (cf. L. molluscum, a fungus which grows on the maple-tree; molluscus, a nut with a thin shell), neut. of L. molluscus, soft, < mollis, soft: see mollis[2].] A soft-bodied animal, usually with an external shell; a member of the Mollusca in any sense. See Mollusca. — Articulated mollusks, a former name of De Blainville's Malentozoaria, comprising the cirripeds and the chitons, unnaturally associated. See Nematopoda, Polyplaxiphora. — Hemal mollusks, those mollusks (and supposed molluscoids) whose intestine has a hemal flexure, as the heteropods, many gastropods, etc. — Neural mollusks, those mollusks and molluscoids whose intestine has a neural flexure. They are the cephalopods, pteropods, pulmonates, and lamellibranchs, together with brachiopods and polyzoans.

molluskigerous (mol-us-kij'e-rus), a. [Prop. molluscigerous*; < NL. molluscum, a mollusk, + L. gerere, carry: see -ger, -gerous.] Having or bearing mollusks: specifically applied by Huxley to the elongated tubular sacs occasionally found attached by one end to an intestinal vessel of an echinoderm, Synapta digitata, and containing the ova or embryos of the molluscan parasite Entoconcha mirabilis.

moll-washer (mol'wosh″er), n. The washer or wagtail, a bird. Also called molly wash-dish, etc. [Local, Eng.]

moll-wire (mol'wīr), n. A pickpocket who robs women only. [Thieves' slang.]

Molly[1] (mol'i), n. [Dim. of Moll, or var. of the orig. Mary: see Moll[1].] 1. A familiar form of the feminine name Mary. — 2. [l. c.; pl. mollies (-iz).] The wagtail, a bird: as, the yellow molly (the yellow wagtail); the molly wash-dish (the pied wagtail). [Local, Eng.]

molly[2] (mol'i), n.; pl. mollies (-iz). [Abbr. of mollymawk, mallemuck.] The mallemuck or fulmar, Fulmarus glacialis. See fulmar[2].

molly[3] (mol'i), n.; pl. mollies (-iz). [Hind. mālī.] In India, a gardener or one of the caste of gardeners. Also mallee.

Our garden is nearly washed away, and our molly, or gardener, does not present us with our morning bouquet. W. H. Russell, Diary in India, II. 121.

mollycoddle (mol'i-kod-l), n. [Also mollcoddle; < Molly[1], Moll[1], + coddle[2].] One who lacks resolution, energy, or hardihood; an effeminate man: used in derision or contempt.

He [Fielding] couldn't do otherwise than laugh at the puny cockney bookseller, pouring out endless volumes of sentimental twaddle, and hold him up to scorn as a mollcoddle and a milksop. Thackeray, English Humorists, Hogarth, Smollett, and Fielding.

molly cottontail. See cottontail.

Molly Maguire (mol'i ma-gwīr'). [A name assumed (from Molly, a familiar form of the feminine name Mary, and Maguire, a common Irish surname) by the members of the organization (def. 1), in allusion to the woman's dress they wore as a disguise. There is no evidence that the name referred orig. to a particular person named Molly Maguire.] 1. A member of a lawless secret association in Ireland, organized with the object of defeating and terrorizing agents and process-servers, and others engaged in the business of evicting tenants.

These Molly Maguires were generally stout active young men, dressed up in women's clothes, with faces blackened or otherwise disguised. . . . In this state they used suddenly to surprise the unfortunate grippers, keepers, or process-servers, and either duck them in bog-holes or beat them in the most unmerciful manner, so that the Molly Maguires became the terror of all our officials. W. S. Trench, Realities of Irish Life, vi.

Hence — 2. A member of a secret organization in the mining regions of Pennsylvania, notorious for the commission of various crimes, including murderous attacks upon the owners, officers, or agents of mines, until their suppression by the execution of several of their leaders, about 1877.

mollymawk (mol'i-mâk), n. A variant of mallemuck.

molly-puff† (mol'i-puf), n. A gambling decoy.

Thou molly-puff! were it not justice to kick thy guts out? Shirley, The Wedding, iv. 3.

Moloch (mō'lok), n. [Also sometimes Molech; < LL. Moloch, < Gr. Μολόχ, Μολώχ, < Heb. mōlekh (usually with the article) (also Milkōm, Malkām, > Gr. Μελχόμ, E. Milcom); cf. melekh (= Ar. melik, king, < mālakh, reign, part. mōlēkh, reigning).] 1. The chief god of the Phenicians, frequently mentioned in Scripture as the god of the Ammonites, whose worship consisted chiefly of human sacrifices, ordeals by fire, mutilation, etc.: also identified with the god of the Carthaginians called by classical writers Kronos or Saturn. Hence the word has now become a designation of any baneful influence to which everything is sacrificed.

And they built the high places of Baal, . . . to cause their sons and their daughters to pass through the fire unto Molech; which I commanded them not. Jer. xxxii. 35.

First Moloch, horrid king, besmear'd with blood
Of human sacrifice, and parents' tears.
Milton, P. L., i. 392.

It was a very Moloch of a baby, on whose insatiate altar the whole existence of this particular young brother was offered up a daily sacrifice. Dickens, The Haunted Man, ii.

2. [NL.] The typical genus of Molochinæ. There is but one species, M. horridus of Australia, one of the most repulsive, though in reality one of the most harmless, of reptiles, the horns on the head and the numerous spines on the body giving it a formidable aspect. 3. [l. c.] A lizard of this genus: as, the spiny moloch.

Molochinæ (mol-ō-kī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Moloch + -inæ.] A subfamily of agamoid lizards having a depressed body, a very small mouth, and the upper teeth directed horizontally inward. The body is beset with large spines, especially on the head, giving an ugly and formidable appearance to an entirely harmless creature.

molochine (mol'ō-kin), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Molochinæ.

II. n. A moloch.

Molochize (mō'lok-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. Molochized, ppr. Molochizing. [< Moloch + -ize.] To sacrifice or immolate as to Moloch. [Rare.]

I think that they would Molochize them [their babies] too, To have the heavens clear. Tennyson, Harold, i. 1.

moloid (mol'oid), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Moloidea.

II. n. A member of the family Molidæ.

Moloidea (mō-loi'dē-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Mola + -oidea.] In Gill's ichthyological system, a superfamily of gymnodont plectognath fishes, founded upon the single family Molidæ. The moloids are without pelvis or ribs; they have the body truncated behind, the caudal region aborted, and the jaws without median sutures. See Molidæ.

Molokan (mol-ō-kän'), n.; pl. Molokani (-ē). [Russ. molokanŭ, < moloko, milk: see milk.] A member of a Russian sect living chiefly in southeastern Russia. They condemn image-worship, fasting, and episcopacy, and accept the Bible as the only rule of faith and conduct. They hold their religious services in private houses, and have a simple church organization. Their name is derived from their reputed practice of drinking milk on fast-days — a departure from the custom of the Orthodox Church. Also written Malakan.

The Molokani are Russian sectarians — closely resembling Scotch Presbyterians. D. M. Wallace, Russia, p. 157.

molompi (mō-lom'pi), n. [Native name.] The African rosewood. See rosewood.

molopes (mō-lō'pēz), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μώλωψ (μωλωπ-), the mark of a stripe, a weal.] In pathol., same as vibices.

molosse (mō-los'), n. [< F. molosse = Sp. moloso, < L. molossus, a foot so called: see molossus.] Same as molossus, 1.

molossi, n. Plural of molossus, 1.

Molossian (mō-los'i-an), a. and n. [< L. Molossia, < Gr. Μολοσσία, the country of the Molossi, < Μολοσσός, Molossian, pl. Μολοσσοί, L. Molossi, the Molossians.] I. a. Relating or belonging to the Molossians, or Molossi, a tribe of ancient Epirus, in northern Greece.

II. n. 1. One of the Molossian tribe. — 2. [l. c.] One of the Molossidæ.

molossic (mō-los'ik), a. [< Molossus + -ic.] In pros., being or pertaining to a molossus.

Molossidæ (mō-los'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Molossus + -idæ.] The Molossinæ regarded as a family composed of the genera Molossus, Nyctinomus, and Chiromeles; the bulldog bats, or mastiff bats.

Molossinæ (mol-ō-sī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Molossus + -inæ.] A subfamily of bats of the family Emballonuridæ; the molossoid or bulldog bats: so called from the physiognomy, a peculiar expression being conferred by the thick pendulous chops, like a bulldog's. They have large feet, with the first toe, or first and also the fifth, much larger than the rest, the feet free from the wing-membranes, which fold under the forearm, a retractile interfemoral membrane sheathing and sliding along the tail, and a single pair of large upper incisors. In all the genera, excepting Mystacina, the long tail is produced far beyond the interfemoral membrane. Leading genera are Molossus, Chiromeles, and Mystacina.

molossine (mō-los'in), a. and n. [< Molossus + -ine[1].] I. a. Pertaining to the Molossinæ, or having their characters; molossoid.

II. n. A bulldog bat; a molossoid.

molossoid (mō-los'oid), a. and n. [< Molossus + -oid.] I. a. Molossine, in a wide sense; pertaining to or resembling the Molossinæ.

II. n. A member of the Molossinæ; a molossoid bat.

Molossus (mō-los'us), n. [In def. 1, L. molossus, a metrical foot, < Gr. μολοσσός, a metrical foot of three long syllables, < Μολοσσός, Molossian. In def. 2, NL., < L. Molossus, a Molossian hound, < Gr. Μολοσσός, Molossian: see Molossian.] 1. [l. c.; pl. molossi (-ī).] In classical pros., a foot of three long syllables. — 2. In mammal., the typical and leading genus of Molossinæ. There are numerous species, inhabiting tropical and subtropical America, as M. glaucinus, M. obscurus, etc. These bulldog bats have the tail long and exserted, thick pendulous lips, prominent nostrils, large rounded ears, the incisors one above and one or two below on each side, and the premolars two below and one or two above on each side. 3. In conch., a genus of mollusks. Montfort, 1808.

Molothrus (mol'ō-thrus), n. [NL. (Swainson, 1831), said by the namer to come from Gr. "μόλοθρος*, qui non vocatus alienas ædes intrat," an unbidden guest, appar. an error for Molobrus (as given by J. Cabanis), < Gr. μολοβρός, a greedy fellow.] A genus of American oscine passerine birds of the family Icteridæ and subfamily Agelæinæ, parasitic in habit; the cow-birds, cowpen-birds, or cow-buntings. There are several species, of North and South America, all of which lay their eggs in other birds' nests, so far as is known, like the Old World cuckoos. M. ater or pecoris abounds in most parts of the United States. M. æneus, a large handsome species, inhabiting Texas and Mexico, is the bronzed or red-eyed cow-bird. The genus is also called Hypobletis. See cut under cow-bird.

molrooken (mol'rūk-en), n. [Origin obscure.] The great crested grebe, Podiceps cristatus. C. Swainson. [Lough Neagh, Ireland.]

molsh†, a. See mulsh.

molt[1]† An obsolete preterit of melt[1]. Chaucer.

molt[2], moult[1] (mōlt), v. [With unorig. l, < ME. mouten, mowten = D. muiten = MLG. LG. muten = OHG. mūzōn, MHG. mūzen, change, G. mausen, change the feathers or skin, molt, < L. mutare, change: see mute[2] and mew[3], doublets of molt[2].] I. trans. To shed or cast, as feathers, hair, or skin; slough off: often used figuratively.

So shall my anticipation prevent your discovery, and your secrecy to the king and queen moult no feather.
Shak., Hamlet, ii. 2. 306.

Mute the skylark and forlorn,
When she moults the firstling plumes. Coleridge.

We all moult our names in the natural course of life.
Southey, The Doctor, lxxx. (Davies.)

II. intrans. 1. To cast or shed feathers, hair, skin, or the like; undergo or accomplish a molt; exuviate; mew. See the noun.

Long as the bird may live, and often as it may moult, the original style of markings never gives way to any other.
A. Newton, Encyc. Brit., IX. 3.

2. To be about to be cast off or shed, as plumage.

Our hero gave him such a sudden fist in the mouth as dashed in two of his teeth that then happened to be moulting. Brooke, Fool of Quality, i. 104. (Davies.) molt[2], moult[1] (mōlt), n. [< molt[2], moult[1], v.] 1. The act or process of shedding or casting any tegumentary, cuticular, or exoskeletal structures or appendages, as feathers, hair, skin, nails, horns, hoofs, claws, or shell; ecdysis; exuviation. The surface of the body of most animals, outside of the parts which are vascular or supplied with blood, is worn away by friction, attrition, or other mechanical means. This process may be slight and gradual or continuous, as in the case of man, where it results in scarf-skin and dandruff; or it may be periodical and very extensive, affecting the whole cuticle or its appendages. Mammals shed their hair usually once a year. Birds molt their feathers usually at least once, often twice, sometimes thrice a year, the last two cases constituting the double and the triple molt. Both these classes of animals, in some cases, molt cuticular substances in mass. Thus, the American antelope sheds the sheath of the horn; lemmings and ptarmigans drop their claws; some birds of the auk family shed the horny parts of the beak; snakes cast their cuticle whole, even to the layer over the eyeball; crustaceans slough the whole shell; and numberless other invertebrates have a proper molt of similar or analogous character.

2. The period or time of molting.

moltable† (mōl'ta-bl), a. [Irreg. for meltable.] That can be melted; fusible.

molte†. An obsolete past participle of melt[1]. Chaucer.

molten[1] (mōl'tn), p. a. [Pp. of melt[1].] 1. Melted; in a state of fusion or solution: as, molten gold.

Love's mystick form the artizans of Greece
In wounded stone or molten gold express. Prior.

Solid iron floats upon molten iron exactly as ice floats upon water. Tyndall, Forms of Water, p. 124.

A prince whose manhood was all gone,
And molten down in mere uxoriousness.
Tennyson, Geraint.

2. Made or produced by means of melting.

And he received them at their hand, and fashioned it with a graving tool, after he had made it a molten calf.
Ex. xxxii. 4.

3†. Liquid.

Sum hem kepe
Three nyght in molton dounge.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 54.

molten[2]†, moulten† (mōl'tn), p. a. [Irreg. for molted, pp. of molt[2], v.] Having molted; being in the state of molting.

A clip-wing'd Griffin, and a moulten Rauen.
Shak., 1 Hen. IV. (fol. 1623), iii. 1. 152.

moltenly (mōl'tn-li), adv. Like what is in a melted state; liquidly.

A living language . . . moltenly ductile to new shapes of sharp and clear relief in the moulds of new thought.
Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 155.

molting, moulting (mōl'ting), n. [With unorig. l, as in molt[2], moult[1], v., < ME. mouting, mowtynge; verbal n. of molt[2], moult[1], v.] 1. The act or process of molting; molt.

O hath my leaden soul the art t' improve
Her wasted talent, and, unrais'd, aspire
In this sad moulting time of her desire?
Quarles, Emblems, v. 4.

2†. The molting season.

Also in sothe the seson was paste ffor hertis y-heedid so hy and so noble
To make ony myrthe ffor mowtynge that nyghed.
Richard the Redeless, ii. 12.

molto (mōl'tō), adv. [It., very much, < L. multus, much: see multitude.] In music, very; much: as, allegro molto, very fast.

Molucca balm. See Moluccella.

Molucca bean, deer, etc. See bean, etc.

Moluccella (mol-uk-sel'ä), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), named from the Molucca Islands, of which the plant was supposed to be a native.] A genus of labiate plants of the tribe Stachydeæ and the subtribe Lamieæ. It is characterized by the posterior lip of the corolla being usually concave and covered with long soft hairs, by the calyx being larger at the apex, with an oblique limb having from five to thirteen unequal spiny teeth, and by having the anther-cells extremely divergent. They are very smooth annual herbs, with petiolate leaves and axillary whorls of small flowers. There are but 2 species, both native in the eastern Mediterranean region. M. lævis, an old garden-flower from Asia, once supposed to come from the Moluccas, is called Molucca balm, and also shell-flower, from its large cup-shaped calyx, which has the small corolla at the bottom.

Molva (mol'vä), n. [NL. (Nilsson, 1832), a name of this fish.] A genus of gadoid fishes, related to the burbots and cusks, having the mouth terminal, anal fin entire, and canine teeth on the vomer and mandible. M. molva is the common ling of North Atlantic waters. See cut under ling.

molwart†, n. See moldwarp.

moly[1] (mō'li), a. [Also moley; < mole[2] + -y[1].] Like a mole or its habits. [Rare.]

He . . . did . . . infinite service in discouraging . . . the moley, creeping style, which at that time infected all the ranks both of the laity and clergy.
Goldsmith, Encouragers and Discouragers of English [Literature, ii.

moly[2] (mō'li), n. [< L. moly, < Gr. μῶλυ, a fabulous herb.] 1. A fabulous herb of magic power, represented as having a black root and the flower milk-white, said by Homer to have been given by Hermes to Odysseus (Ulysses) to counteract the spells of Circe.

And yet more med'cinal is it than that moly
That Hermes once to wise Ulysses gave.
Milton, Comus, l. 636.

But as ye hearb moly hath a floure as white as snow, and a roote as blacke as incke, so age hath a white head, showing pietie, but a black hart, swelling with mischiefe. Lyly, Euphues and his England (Arber's Reprints, IV. 231).

Homer is of opinion That the principall and soveraigne hearb of all others is moly; so called (as he thinketh) by the Gods themselves. Holland, tr. of Pliny, xxv. 4.

2. Wild garlic, Allium Moly. The moly of Dioscorides is said to have been Allium subhirsutum; the dwarf moly is A. Chamæmoly.

★molybdate (mō-lib'dāt), n. [< molybd(ic) + -ate[1].] A compound of molybdic acid with a base.—Molybdate of lead, yellow lead ore; the mineral wulfenite. See wulfenite.

molybdena (mol-ib-dē'nä), n. [= F. molybdène = Sp. It. molibdena = Pg. molybdene, molybdena, < L. molybdæna, < Gr. μολύβδαινα, galena or litharge, < μόλυβδος, lead, = L. plumbum, lead: see plumb.] Molybdenum, or its native sulphid.

molybdeniferous (mol"ib-dē-nif'e-rus), a. [< L. molybdæna (see molybdena) + ferre = E. bear[1].] Containing molybdenum.

molybdenite (mol-ib-dē'nīt), n. [< molybdena + -ite[2].] Sulphid of molybdenum, occurring in foliated masses or in scales, less often in hexagonal crystals, of a lead-gray color and metallic luster. It is very soft, and, like graphite, which it closely resembles, leaves a trace on paper.

molybdenous (mol-ib-dē'nus), a. [< molybdenum + -ous.] Pertaining to or obtained from molybdenum.

★molybdenum (mol-ib-dē'num), n. [< NL. molybdænum, a later form for L. molybdæna: see molybdena.] Chemical symbol, Mo; atomic weight, 96. A metal of a silver-white color, but harder than silver, which fuses with difficulty, if at all, at the highest temperature of a wind-furnace. Its specific gravity is 9.01. It is chemically related to chromium, tungsten, and uranium, and, like those metals, forms trioxids which are acid-forming and yield very characteristic salts. It is remarkable for the number of oxids and corresponding chlorids which it forms; but it is the least important economically of the group to which it belongs. The most abundant ore of molybdenum is the sulphuret (molybdenite), and the strong external resemblance of this mineral to graphite (Latin plumbago) led to the confusion of molybdena with that substance; moreover, external resemblance and certain chemical peculiarities caused still further difficulties of nomenclature, in which manganese, antimony, and even magnesia were involved. Thus, the peroxid of manganese was called by Linnæus molybdænum magnesii. These perplexities were not cleared up until toward the end of the 18th century; but finally, as the result of the labors of Scheele, Bergman, and Hjelm (1778–90), the metal molybdena, or molybdenum, as it is now more generally called, was isolated from its combinations. The ores of molybdenum are somewhat widely diffused, but rarely occur in any considerable quantity. The principal molybdeniferous minerals are molybdenite and wulfenite. There is also a molybdic ocher (the trioxid) and a calcium molybdate (powellite); various ores of iron also contain traces of this metal.

molybdic (mō-lib'dik), a. [= F. molybdique; as molybd(enum) + -ic.] Pertaining to or obtained from molybdenum.—Molybdic acid, H_2MoO_4, an acid of molybdenum, which may be obtained in yellow crystalline crusts. Its salts are called molybdates.—Molybdic ocher, native molybdic oxid.

molybdin (mō-lib'din), n. [< molybd(enum) + -in[2].] Molybdic ocher.

molybdite (mō-lib'dīt), n. [< molybd(enum) + -ite[2].] Molybdic ocher.

molybdocolic (mō-lib-dō-kol'ik), n. [< Gr. μόλυβδος, lead, + κωλική, colic: see colic.] Lead-colic.

molybdomenite (mō-lib-dō-mē'nīt), n. [< Gr. μόλυβδος, lead, + μήνη, moon, + -ite[2] (cf. selenite).] A rare lead selenite, occurring in thin transparent scales of a white or greenish color, found with other selenium minerals at Cacheuta in the Argentine Republic.

molybdoparesis (mō-lib-dō-par'e-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μόλυβδος, lead, + πάρεσις, palsy.] Lead-palsy.

molybdosis (mol-ib-dō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μόλυβδος, lead.] Lead-poisoning.

molyné (mo-li-nā'), a. [See moline.] In her., same as moline when applied to a cross.

molysite (mol'i-sīt), n. [Said to be < Gr. μόλυσις*, var. of μόλυνσις, a staining, defilement, < μολύνειν, stain, also half-cook, + -ite[2].] A chlorid of iron occurring as a thin yellow or red incrustation on lava at Vesuvius.

mom†, a., n., and v. See mum[1].

momblement†, n. See mumblement.

mome[1] (mōm), n. [< OF. mome, a mask: see mum[2].] A buffoon; a fool; a blockhead; a ninny; a dull person; a stupid fellow.

I dare be bold awhile to play the mome,
Out of my sacke some other faults to lease.
Mir. for Mags., 466. (Nares.)

Mome, malt-horse, capon, coxcomb, idiot, patch!
Either get thee from the door, or sit down at the hatch:
. . . Go, get thee from the door.
Shak., C. of E., iii. 1. 32.

Words are but wind, but blowes come home,
A stout tongu'd lawyer 's but a mome.
Brome's Songs (1661), p. 105. (Halliwell.)

Parnassus is not clome
By every such mome.
Drayton, Skeltoniad, p. 1373. (Nares.)

Away with this foolish mome!
Flodden Field (Child's Ballads, VII. 73).

mome[2] (mōm), a. [Cf. mum[1].] Soft; smooth. Halliwell. [North. Eng.]

mome[3]†, n. [ME. mome = MD. moeme, D. moei = MLG. môme = OHG. muomā, MHG. muome, G. muhme, aunt, cousin; cf. Icel. móna, mother; prob. orig. 'mother's sister,' and related to AS. mōdor, E. mother: see mother[1].] An aunt. Nominale MS. (Halliwell.) momelet†, v. An obsolete form of mumble.

moment (mō'ment), n. [< F. moment = Sp. Pg. It. momento, a moment, < L. momentum, a balance, balancing, alteration, a particle sufficient to turn the scales, hence a particle, point, point of time, short time, moment, a cause, circumstance, matter, weight, influence; contr. of mov(i)mentum*, < movere, move: see move, v. Cf. movement.] 1. A space of time incalculably or indefinitely small. (a) Time too brief for reckoning; an instant: as, I have but a moment to spare; wait a moment.

We shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye. 1 Cor. xv. 52.

Do not delay; the golden moments fly!
Longfellow, Masque of Pandora, vii.

(b) Precise point of time; exact or very instant, as of a motion, action, or occurrence: as, at that moment he expired.

A prince, the moment he is crown'd,
Inherits every virtue sound.
Swift, On Poetry, l. 90.

Every moment dies a man,
Every moment one is born.
Tennyson, Vision of Sin, iv.

(c) A brief interval; the passing time: in the phrase for a or the moment: as, for a moment he was at a loss.

The lip of truth shall be established for ever; but a lying tongue is but for a moment. Prov. xii. 19.

The "Daily News" expresses the general sense . . . in recognizing defeat as decisive for the moment.
New York Tribune, July 15, 1886.

2. The present time; especially, with the definite article, the precise instant of opportunity.

The moment should be improved; if suffered to pass away, it may never return.
Washington, in Bancroft's Hist. Const., I. 21.

3. Momentum; impetus; moving cause; impelling force or occasion.

Each on himself relied,
As only in his arm the moment lay
Of victory. Milton, P. L., vi. 239.

4. Notable purport; weight or value; importance; consequence: as, his opinions are of little moment to us.

Being for many respects of greater moment, to haue them [princes] good and vertuous then any inferior sort of men. Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 28.

Captall criminals, or matters of moment, before the Chan himselfe, or Priuie Counsells, of whom they are alwayes heard, and speedily discharged.
Capt. John Smith, True Travels, I. 36.

5†. A forcible or convincing plea.

He . . . pressed the former arguments, refuted the cavils, . . . and added . . . many moments and weights to his discourse. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 77.

6. An essential or constituent element; an important factor.

It is a complete mistake historically to assume that the moment of Cartesianism is consciousness.
Veitch, Introd. to Descartes's Method, p. lxxix.

7. In math., an increment or decrement; an infinitesimal change in a varying quantity.—8. In mech., in general, effect; avail. The phrases in which it appears have exact meanings, though the precise sense in which the word itself is taken in these phrases is not always clear.—Bending-moment. Same as moment of flexure.—Equation of moments. See equation.—Logical moments. See logical.—Moment-axis of a couple, the line which represents in direction the direction of a couple, and by its length the moment.—Moment of a couple, the product of the force by the length of the arm.—Moment of a force. (a) With regard to a point, the product of a force by its distance from the point. (b) With reference to a line or axis, the product of the component of the force in the plane perpendicular to the line by the distance of that component from that line.—Moment of a magnet, or magnetic moment, the product of the numerical strength of either pole of the magnet by the distance between the poles.

The total moment of a magnet is the moment when it is at right angles to the lines of force.
J. E. H. Gordon, Elect. and Mag., I. 151.

Moment of deviation or distortion. Same as product of inertia (which see, under inertia).—Moment of flexure. See flexure.—Moment of inertia. See inertia.—Moment of rupture, the moment of flexure of a beam calculated for a predetermined or assumed breaking load and leverage. Its formula is $M = nfbh^2$, in which b = breadth, h = depth, n a factor varying with shape of cross-section, and f a factor depending on the nature of the material. Both factors n and f are determined and tabulated for different materials from experimental data.—Moment of stability of a body or structure supported at a given plane joint, the moment of the couple of forces which must be applied in a given vertical plane to that body or structure in addition to its own weight, in order to transfer the center of resistance of the joint to the limiting position consistent with stability. Rankine.—Virtual moment of a force, the product of the force by the virtual velocity of the point of application.—Syn. 1. Moment, Minute, Instant, twinkling, second, trice, flash. A moment has duration, an instant has not: as, wait a moment; come this instant. Practically, however, the two are often the same. A minute is just sixty seconds; a moment is a short but less definite period.

Moments make the year. Young, Love of Fame, vi. 205.

There are minutes that fix the fate
Of battles and of nations.
H. H. Brownell, The Bay-Fight.

The duke does greet you, general,
And he requires your haste-post-haste appearance,
Even on the instant. Shak., Othello, i. 2. 38.

moment (mō′mẹnt), v. t. [< moment, n.] To order or arrange to a moment.

All accidents are minuted and momented by Divine Providence. Fuller, Worthies, Suffolk, II. 334. (Davies.) momenta, n. Plural of momentum.

momental (mō′mẹn-tal or mō-men′tal), a. [< OF. momental, < LL. momentalis* (in adv. momentaliter), of a moment, < momentum, moment: see moment.] 1†. Pertaining to a moment.—2†. Lasting but a moment; very brief.

Not one momental minute doth she swerve.
Breton, Sir P. Sidney's Ourania (1606).

3†. Momentous.—4. Of or pertaining to momentum.—Momental ellipsoid. See ellipsoid.

momentally† (mō′mẹn-tal-i), adv. 1. For a moment.

Air but momentally remaining in our bodies hath no proportionable space for its conversion, only of length enough to refrigerate the heart. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err.

2. From moment to moment.

Momentally the corporall spirits are dissolved and consumed, as also, in like manner, the humours, and solide parts. Benvenuto, Passengers' Dialogues (1612). (Nares.) momentanet, a. [< OF. momentaine, < LL. momentaneus, of a moment: see momentaneous.] Momentaneous; momentary.

You will remember how transitorie this present life is, and howe short and momentane the pleasure of this filthie flesh is. Stow, Chronicles, The Mercians, an. 749.

momentaneous† (mō-mẹn-tā′nẹ̄-us), a. [= F. momentanée, OF. momentaine (see momentane) = Sp. momentáneo = Pg. It. momentaneo, < LL. momentaneus, < L. momentum, a moment: see moment.] 1. Lasting for a moment; momentary. Johnson.—2. Pertaining to instants of time; instantaneous.

momentaniness† (mō′mẹn-tā-ni-nes), n. [< momentany + -ness.] Momentariness. Bp. Hall, Character of Man.

momentany† (mō′mẹn-tā-ni), a. [< LL. momentaneus: see momentaneous.] Lasting for a moment; momentary.

Making it momentany as a sound,
Swift as a shadow, short as any dream.
Shak., M. N. D., i. 1. 143.

Other momentany delights only supple the forehead, not unburthen and solace the heart. Ford, Line of Life.

momentarily (mō′mẹn-tā-ri-li), adv. 1. So as to be momentary; for a moment.

I repeatedly watched the flowers, and only once saw a humble-bee momentarily alight on one, and then fly away.
Darwin, Different Forms of Flowers, p. 84.

2. From moment to moment: as, he is momentarily expected.

Why endow the vegetable bird with wings, which nature has made momentarily dependent upon the soil?
Shenstone. (Latham.)

momentariness (mō′mẹn-tā-ri-nes), n. The state of being momentary.

momentary (mō′mẹn-tā-ri), a. [< LL. momentarius, of a moment, brief, < L. momentum, a moment: see moment.] 1. Lasting but a moment or for a very short time; of short duration: as, a momentary pang.

Jove's lightnings, the precursors
O' the dreadful thunder-claps, more momentary
And sight-outrunning were not.
Shak., Tempest, i. 2. 202.

With wings more momentary-swift than thought.
Shak., T. and C., iv. 2. 14.

Upon serious consideration of the frailty and uncertainty of this momentary life, . . . I . . . do make and declare . . . my last will and testament.
Winthrop, Hist. New England, II. 436.

His griefs are momentary and his joys immortal.
Steele, Spectator, No. 75.

2. Short-lived; likely to die soon or at any moment. [Obsolete or archaic.]

Men are the subjects of fortune, and therefore momentarie.
Greene, Penelope's Web (1587).

Only give it [this paper] leave to tell you that that lord whom perchance the king may be pleased to hear in it is an old and momentary man. Donne, Letters, cxxix.

That hour perhaps
Is not so far when momentary man
Shall seem no more a something to himself.
Tennyson, Lucretius.

3. Occurring every moment: as, momentary interruptions.

The due clock swinging slow with sweepy sway,
Measuring time's flight with momentary sound.
Warton, Inscriptions.

momently (mō′mẹnt-li), adv. From moment to moment; every moment.

Of tuneful Caves and playful Waterfalls—
Of Mountains varying momently their crests—Proud be this Land!
Wordsworth, Glen of Loch Etive.

Momently the mortar's iron throat
Roared from the trenches.
Whittier, Dream of Pio Nono.

momentous (mō-men′tus), a. [< LL. momentosus, of a moment, < L. momentum, a moment: see moment.] Of moment or consequence; of surpassing importance; critical.

We ought constantly to bear in our mind this momentous truth, that in the hands of the Deity time is nothing, that he has eternity to act in. Paley, Sermons, xxii.

The emigration of the fathers of these twelve commonwealths . . . was the most momentous event of the seventeenth century. Bancroft, Hist. U. S., II. 450.

=Syn. Grave, serious.

momentously (mō-men′tus-li), adv. To a momentous degree; with important effect or influence: as, this engagement bore momentously on the course of the war.

momentousness (mō-men′tus-nes), n. The state or quality of being momentous or of grave importance.

These and many other difficulties beset Dr. M—— in the course of his study; nor is he unaware of their variety or momentousness. Amer. Jour. Philol., VIII. 225.

★momentum (mō-men′tum), n.; pl. momenta (-tä). [< L. momentum, balance, alteration, cause, etc., orig. 'a movement': see moment.] 1. In mech., the product of the mass and velocity of a body; the quantity of motion of a body. In all relations between bodies, such as impacts, the algebraic sum of the momenta is preserved constant. See energy.

When the velocity is the same, . . . the momentum, or moving force, of bodies is directly proportional to their mass or quantity of matter. . . . When the momenta of two bodies are equal, their velocities will be in the inverse proportion of their quantities of matter.
Lardner, Handbook of Nat. Philos., §§ 195, 199.

The rate of mass displacement is momentum, just as the rate of displacement is velocity.
Clerk Maxwell, Matter and Motion, art. lxvii.

2. An impulse; an impelling force; impetus.

This preponderating weight . . . compleated that momentum of ignorance, rashness, presumption, and lust of plunder which nothing has been able to resist.
Burke, Rev. in France.

He never asks whether the political momentum set up by his measure, in some cases decreasing but in other cases greatly increasing, will or will not have the same general direction with other like momenta.
H. Spencer, Man vs. State, p. 26.

3. Constituent or essential element. Compare moment, 6.

I shall state the several momenta of the distinction in separate propositions. Sir W. Hamilton.

4. In musical notation, an eighth-rest.

momie, n. A variant of mummy[1].

momie-cloth, n. See mummy-cloth.

Momier (mom′i-ėr), n. [F., lit. a mummer: see mummer.] A term of reproach applied to those Swiss Calvinists who, about 1818, separated from the state church and maintained a strict Calvinistic theology and Methodistic discipline.

momish† (mō′mish), a. [< mome[1] + -ish[1].] Foolish; dull. Levins.

Thy pleasant framed style Discovered lyes to momish mouthes.
Verses prefixed to Googe's Eglogs. (Davies.)

momism† (mō′mizm), n. [< Momus, 1, + -ism.] Carping; faultfinding. Minsheu.

momist† (mō′mist), n. [< Momus, 1, + -ist.] A faultfinder.

As for the crabbed & criticall interpretation of many, . . . I waigh it little, and lesse the detracting speeches of barking Momists. Times' Whistle (E. E. T. S.), p. 111.

mommery†, n. An obsolete form of mummery.

mommick†, n. [Var. of mammock, n.] A scarecrow. [Prov. Eng.]

mommick (mom′ik), v. t. [Var. of mammock, v.] To cut awkwardly; mess or make a mess of: as, he mommicks his food. [Obsolete or prov.]

mommy (mom′i), n.; pl. mommies (-iz). [A var. of mammy; cf. old-wife, old-squaw, old-granny, etc.] A duck, Harelda glacialis, the old-wife or south-southerly. [Cape May, New Jersey.]

Momordica (mō-môr′di-kạ), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), so called in allusion to the seeds, which have the appearance of being bitten; < L. mordēre (perf. momordi), bite: see mordant.] A genus of plants of the family Cucurbitaceæ and the tribe Cucumerineæ, characterized by the stamens being inserted below the mouth of the calyx, by the calyx being provided with two or three scales, and by having a campanulate corolla and simple tendrils. They are climbing herbs, either annual or perennial, having entire lobed or compound leaves and rather small white or yellowish flowers, which are monœcious or dicœcious. The fruit is oblong or cylindrical, berry-like or opening into three valves, having few or many seeds. Twenty-five species are known, natives chiefly of Africa, but also of tropical Asia and Australia. They are plain plants except for their fruit, which in some species is red or orange-yellow, and which bursts when fully ripe, disclosing the red-arilled seeds. Such are the species M. Balsamina, the balsam-apple, and M. Charantia, sometimes called balsam-pear, the best-known cultivated species. The squirting cucumber, which grows in the south of Europe, was formerly placed in this genus, under the name M. Elaterium, but is now regarded as the type of a distinct genus, Ecballium.

momot (mō′mot), n. Same as motmot.

Momota (mō-mō′tạ), n. [NL.] Same as Momotus. Shaw, 1809.

Momotidæ (mō-mot′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Momotus + -idæ.] An American family of serratirostral picarian birds, typified by the genus Momotus; the motmots or sawbills. They are related to the kingfishers. The tail is long and graduated, of 10 or 12 rectrices, of which the middle pair are usually long-exserted and spatulated, forming a pair of rackets; the plumage is aftershafted, the bill serrated, and the sternum doubly fenestrated; there are no cæca nor spinal apterium; and there are two carotids. The Momotidæ are confined to the warmer parts of America. There are only about 15 species, of the genera Momotus, Crybelus, Baryphthengus, Eumomota, Prionorhynchus, and Hylomanes. The family is also called Prionitidæ. See motmot.

Momotinæ (mō-mō-tī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Momotus + -inæ.] 1. The only subfamily of Momotidæ. Also called Prionitinæ.—2. The Momotidæ as a subfamily of some other family.

Momotus (mō-mō′tus), n. [NL.: see momot, motmot.] The typical genus of Momotidæ, established by Brisson in 1760. It was formerly coextensive with the family, but is now restricted to such species as M. brasiliensis. M. cæruleiceps, the blue-headed sawbill, is the only member of its genus or family found Blue-headed Sawbill (Momotus cæruleiceps).

so far north as the Mexican border of the United States. Also Momota, Baryphonus, and Prionites. See motmot.

Momus (mō′mus), n. [NL., < Gr. Μῶμος, a personification of μῶμος, blame, ridicule.] 1. In classical myth., a son of Night, the god of raillery and censure. He is said to have complained that the man made by Vulcan had not a window in his breast to let his thoughts be seen.

2. In ornith., a genus of humming-birds, of the family Trochilidæ, the type of which is M. idaliæ of Brazil. Mulsant and Verreaux, 1866.—A disciple or a son (or daughter) of Momus, a facetious or funny person; a wag; a clown in a circus.

"I do not think that Wickam is a person of very cheerful spirits, or what one would call a ——" "A daughter of Momus," Miss Tox softly suggested.
Dickens, Dombey and Son, viii.

mon[1]†, n. An obsolete form of moan[1].

mon[2] (mon), n. A dialectal (especially Scotch) form of man. See man, and compare mun[4].

mon[3]†, v. i. Same as moun.

mon[4] (mon), n. [Jap.] A personal crest, badge, or cognizance used in Japan and introduced into decoration of all sorts. For examples, see kikumon and kirimon.

Tokugawa Mon—that is, the mon of the Tokugawa family.

mon-. See mono-.

mona (mō′nä), n. [NL., < Sp. Pg. It. mona, a female monkey: see monkey.] An African monkey, Cercopithecus mona, of highly variegated coloration and docile disposition, often kept in captivity. See cut under Cercopithecus.

monacalt, a. An obsolete spelling of monachal.

monacanthid (mon-a-kan′thid), a. [< Gr. μονάκανθος, with one spine (see monacanthous) + -id[2].] Having uniserial adambulacral spines, as a starfish: distinguished from diplacanthid and polyacanthid.

Monacanthinæ (mon″a-kan-thī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Monacanthus + -inæ.] A subfamily of balistoid fishes, typified by the genus Monacanthus. They have the anterior dorsal fin reduced to a single spine upon the head (whence the name), and have from 18 to 21 vertebræ (7 abdominal and 11 to 14 caudal). The subfamily includes a number of tropical and subtropical marine fishes, some of which are known as leather-jackets, on account of their villous coriaceous integuments.

monacanthine (mon-a-kan′thin), a. and n. I. a. Of or pertaining to the Monacanthinæ.

II. n. A fish of the subfamily Monacanthinæ.

monacanthous (mon-a-kan′thus), a. [< Gr. μονάκανθος, with one spine or prickle, < μόνος, single, + ἄκανθα, a spine or prickle: see acantha.] Having but one spine; monacanthine.

Monacanthus (mon-a-kan′thus), n. [NL.: see monacanthous.] The typical genus of Monacanthinæ, having a spine for a first dorsal fin. Cuvier, 1817. They are numerous in warm seas; M. occidentalis is West Indian, and is occasionally found on the southern coast of the United States.

Monacha (mon′a-kä), n. [NL., < Gr. μοναχός, single, solitary, < μόνος, single: see monk.] 1. A genus of mollusks.—2. In ornith., same as Monasa. P. L. Sclater, 1882.

Monasa of Vieillot I have ventured to correct into Monacha. Sclater, Monog. Puffbirds, p. xl.

monachal (mon′a-kal), a. [Formerly also monacal; < OF. monachal, monacal, F. monacal = Sp. Pg. monacal = It. monacale, < ML. monachalis, of a monk, < LL. monachus, a monk: see monk.] Of or pertaining to monks or nuns; belonging to or characteristic of monastic life, especially with reference to external relations or personal conduct; monastic; monkish: as, monachal morals; monachal austerity.

Robert de Brunne, to illustrate monachal morals, interspersed domestic stories; and . . . that rhyming monk affords the most ancient specimens of English tales in verse. I. D'Israeli, Amen. of Lit., I. 208.

monachism (mon′a-kizm), n. [= F. monachisme = Sp. monaquismo = Pg. It. monachismo, < ML. monachismus, < LGr. μοναχισμός, monkery, < μοναχός, a monk: see monk.] 1. The principle of living in the manner of monks; the system or course of life pursued by monks and nuns; primarily, the practice of living alone in religious retirement from the world; religious seclusion; secondarily, the corporate life of religious communities under vows of poverty, celibacy, and obedience to a superior. See monk.

The root-idea of monachism is . . . retirement from society in search of some ideal of life which society cannot supply, but which is thought attainable by abnegation of self and withdrawal from the world. This definition applies to all forms of monachism, . . . whether amongst Brahmans, Buddhists, Jews, Christians, Moslems, or the communistic societies of the present day, even when theoretically anti-theological. This broad general conception of monachism is differenced in the following ways:—It may take the form of absolute separation, so far as practicable, from all human intercourse, so as to give the whole life to solitary contemplation—the anchoretic type; or it may seek fellowship with kindred spirits in a new association for the same common end—the cœnobitic type; it may abandon society as incurably corrupt, as a City of Destruction out of which the fugitive must flee absolutely—the Oriental view, for the most part; or it may consider itself as having a mission to influence and regenerate society—which has been, on the whole, and with minor exceptions, the Western theory of the monastic life.
Encyc. Brit., XVI. 698.

2. A monastic characteristic or peculiarity; also, such characteristics collectively.

Florence of Worster, Huntingdon, Simeon of Durham, Hoveden, Mathew of Westminster, and many others of obscurer note, with all their monachisms.
Milton, Hist. Eng., iv.

Monachus (mon′a-kus), n. [NL., < Gr. μοναχός, single, solitary, LGr. a monk: see monk.] 1. In mammal., a genus of Phocidæ, having four incisors above and below; the monk-seals. There are 2 species. M. albiventer is the seal of the Mediterranean and Black Sea. M. tropicalis is the West Indian seal. Also called Pelagius and Heliophoca.

2. In ornith., a genus of warblers containing such as the common blackcap, Sylvia atricapilla. J. J. Kaup, 1829.—3. In entom., a large and important genus of leaf-beetles, erected by Suffrian in 1852. It is composed of small bluish beetles with or without red spots, and with the body very convex. There are about 100 species, nearly all American, of which 6 belong to North America and the rest to more tropical regions.

monacid (mon-as′id), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + E. acid.] Capable of saturating a single molecule of a monobasic acid: applied to hydroxids and basic oxids.

monact (mon-akt′), a. and n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + ἀκτίς, a ray.] I. a. Having only one ray; monactinal.

II. n. A monactinal sponge-spicule.

monactinal (mo-nak′ti-nal), a. [< monactine + -al.] Single-rayed; uniradiate, as a sponge-spicule.

monactine (mo-nak′tin), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), a ray.] Same as monactinal. Sollas.

Monactinellinæ (mo-nak″ti-ne-lī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + ἀκτίς (ἀκτιν-), a ray, + dim. -ella + -inæ.] A group, subordinal or other, of fibrosilicious or ceratosilicoid sponges, having comparatively little ceratode, the skeleton being mostly composed of single straight silicious spicules, whence the name. The breadcrumb sponge, Halichondria panicea, is a characteristic example. See Monaxonida.

monactinelline (mo-nak-ti-nel′in), a. Of or pertaining to the Monactinellinæ.

★monad (mon′ad), n. and a. [= F. monade = Sp. mónada = Pg. monada = It. monade, < LL. monas (monad-), < Gr. μονάς (μοναδ-), a unit, unity, as adj. solitary, single, < μόνος (Ionic μοῖνος, Doric μῶνος, orig. μονϝος*), alone, solitary, single, sole, only; appar. akin to μία, fem. of εἷς (ἑν-), one.] I. n. 1. In metaph., an individual and indivisible substance. The word was introduced into philosophy by Giordano Bruno to denote the minimum parts of substances supposed by him to be at once psychical and material. In the philosophy of Leibnitz the conception of the monad is that of an absolutely unextended substance existing in space, its existence consisting in its activities, which are ideas; and the universe was conceived by him as made up of such existences. The history of each monad follows an internal law, and all interaction between the monads is excluded; but there is a preestablished harmony between these laws for the different monads. (See Leibnitzian.) The Leibnitzian theory of the monad was, in many particulars, revived by Hermann Lotze.

Pythagoras his monads, so much talked of, were nothing else but corporeal atoms.
Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 13.

The soul is a monad (according to Bruno). It is never entirely without a body. God is the monad of monads; he is the minimum, because all things are external to him, and at the same time the maximum, since all things are in him. . . . The atoms of the ancients differed from one another in magnitude, figure, and position, but not qualitatively or in internal character. The monads of Leibniz, on the contrary, are qualitatively differentiated by their ideas. All monads have ideas, but the ideas of the different monads are of different degrees of clearness. . . . God is the primitive monad; all other monads are its fulgurations.
Ueberweg, Hist. Philos. (tr. by Morris), II. 27.

2. In biol.: (a) Any simple single-celled organism. The name covers a great many similar but not necessarily related unicellular organisms, some of which are monads in sense (b), others being plants; others again are free flagellate cells representing an embryonic condition of some other organism or of wholly indeterminate character.

We are warranted in considering the body as a commonwealth of monads, each of which has independent powers of life, growth, and reproduction.
H. Spencer, Social Statics, p. 493.

(b) In zoöl., specifically, a flagellate protozoan; one of the Mastigophora, characterized by the possession of one or two long whip-like flagella, and generally exhibiting an endoplast and a contractile vacuole. The word in this sense is derived from the name of the genus Monas.—3. In chem., an element whose atoms have the lowest valence or atomicity, which valence is therefore taken as unity.

II. a. In chem. and biol., of or pertaining to monads; of the nature of a monad; monadiform.

Many monad metals give us their line spectra at a low degree of heat. J. N. Lockyer, Spect. Anal., p. 124.

There is reason to think that certain organisms which pass through a monad stage of existence, such as the Myxomycetes, are, at one time of their lives, dependent upon external sources for their protein matter, or are animals; and, at another period, manufacture it, or are plants.
Huxley, Animal and Vegetable Kingdoms.

monad-deme (mon′ad-dēm), n. [< monad + deme[2].] A colony or aggregate of undifferentiated monads.

Starting from the unit of the first order, the plastid or monad, and terming any undifferentiated aggregate a deme, we have a monad-deme. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 843.

monadelph[1] (mon′a-delf), n. [< Monadelphia[1].] In bot., a plant whose stamens are united in one body or set by the filaments.

monadelph[2] (mon′a-delf), n. [< Monadelphia[2].] In zoöl., a member of that division of mammals in which the uterus is single.

Monadelphia[1] (mon-a-del′fi-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, alone, + -ἀδελφία, < ἀδελφός, brother: see -adelphia.] The name given by Linnæus to his sixteenth class of plants, comprising those that have their stamens united into one set by their filaments.

Monadelphous Flower.

Monadelphia[2] (mon-a-del′-fi-ä), n. pl. An erroneous form for Monodelphia.

monadelphian (mon-a-del′fi-an), a. [< Monadelphia[1] + -an.] Same as monadelphous.

monadelphic (mon-a-del′fik), a. [As Monadelphia[1] + -ic.] Pertaining to a family consisting of a single individual.—Monadelphic form, in math., a form belonging to a monadelphic type.—Monadelphic type, in math., a type containing a single numerical parameter.

monadelphon (mon-a-del′fon), n. [NL.: see Monadelphia[1].] In bot., an androecium of which the filaments are combined into a single column.

monadelphous (mon-a-del′fus), a. [As monadelph[1] + -ous.] In bot., having the stamens united into one set by their filaments; belonging or relating to the class Monadelphia.

monadiary (mō-nad′i-ā-ri), n.; pl. monadiaries (-riz). [< NL. monadiarium*, < LL. monas (monad-), a monad: see monad.] The common envelop of a colony of monads or monadiform infusorians.

monadic (mō-nad′ik), a. [< Gr. μοναδικός, single, < μονάς (μοναδ-), a unit: see monad.] 1. Pertaining to monads; having the nature or character of a monad.—2. Single; not occurring in pairs. [Rare.]

So, too, we have the seven openings of the head, the three twin pairs of eyes, ears, and nostrils, with the monadic mouth to make the seventh.
J. Hadley, Essays, p. 342.

monadical (mō-nad'i-kal), a. [< monadic + -al.] Same as monadic. Dr. H. More, Def. of Philosophic Cabbala, App., ix.

monadically (mō-nad'i-kal-i), adv. As a monad or unit; by oneness.

Every number subsists monadically in unity.
T. Taylor, Trans. of Plotinus (1794), Int., p. xxxix.

Monadidæ (mō-nad'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < LL. monas (monad-) + -idæ.] The monads proper, a family of flagellate infusorians. These animalcules are naked or illoricate, and entirely free-swimming, with the flagellum single and terminal, no distinct oral aperture, an endoplast or nucleus, and usually one or more contractile vacuoles. Also Monadella.

monadiform (mō-nad'i-fôrm), a. [< LL. monas (monad-), a unit, + L. forma, form.] In biol., having the form or character of a monad; resembling a monad. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 96.

1, monadiform endodermal cell of a sponge; 2, the amœbiform state of an endodermal cell of the same.

monadigerous (mon-a-dij'e-rus), a. [< LL. monas (monad-) + L. gerere, carry: see -ger, -gerous.] In zoöl., bearing or composed of monads or monadiform cells: as, the monadigerous layer of a sponge, which is the layer of cells lining the walls of the flagellated chambers of sponges. H. James Clark.

Monadina (mon-a-dī'nä), n. pl. [NL., < LL. monas (monad-) + *-ina*².] Ehrenberg's name of the monads or flagellate infusorians now called Monadidæ.

monadine (mon'a-din), a. Of or pertaining to the Monadina or Monadidæ; having the character of a monad. Carpenter, Micros., § 418.

Monadineæ (mon-a-din'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Cienkowski), < Gr. μονάς (μοναδ-), a unit, + -ineæ.] An order of fungi of the class Myxomycetes. They are slimy plants growing in moist places, frequently parasitic, and produce zoöcysts, sporocysts, plasmodia, zoöspores, and induring spores, the zoöcysts emitting at maturity one to many zoöspores or amœba-like bodies.

monadism (mon'a-dizm), n. [= F. monadisme = Sp. monadismo; as monad + -ism.] 1. A philosophical system which accepts, in some form, the theory of monads; also, a theory of monads.

Not unfrequently he [Leibnitz] introduces his theory of monadism by the argument that there must be simple substances since there are composite things, for the composite is only an aggregate of simple units.
E. Caird, Philos. of Kant, p. 86.

2. The application of the conception of the monad to the solution of the problems of chemistry and physics; atomism.

Of the different forms of the atomic theory, that of Boscovich may be taken as an example of the purest monadism. Encyc. Brit., III. 37.

monadology (mon-a-dol'ō-ji), n. [= F. monadologie, < Gr. μονάς (μοναδ-), a unit (see monad), + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] In the philosophy of Leibnitz, the doctrine of monads; also, any similar metaphysical theory, as that of Lotze. See monad, 1.

Leibnitz's monadology may be a true system; but also it may not; and our faculties do not enable us to say whether it is or is not. Leslie Stephen, Eng. Thought, i. § 35.

Lotze, however, saves himself from a materialistic dualism through his monadology. Mind, XII. 589.

monal (mō-näl'), n. Same as monaul.

monamine (mon'am-in), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + E. amine.] One of a class of chemical compounds formed by substituting one or more alcohol radicals for the hydrogen in a single ammonia molecule. Monamines are primary, secondary, or tertiary, according as one, two, or three atoms of hydrogen are replaced.

mononapestic (mon-an-a-pes'tik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + ἀνάπαιστος, anapest: see anapestic.] In anc. pros., containing but one anapest: noting certain logaœdic meters. See monodactylic.

monander (mō-nan'dėr), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + ἀνήρ (ἀνδρ-), man, male (in mod. bot. stamen). Cf. monandrous.] In bot., a plant having one stamen only.

Monandria (mō-nan'dri-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + ἀνήρ (ἀνδρ-), man, male (in mod. bot. stamen).] The first class in Linnæus's system of plants, comprehending all genera with perfect flowers having only one stamen.

monandrian (mō-nan'dri-an), a. [< Monandria + -an.] Same as monandrous.

monandrous (mō-nan'drus), a. [< Gr. μόνανδρος, having but one husband, < μόνος, single, + ἀνήρ (ἀνδρ-), man, male. In def. 2, cf. Monandria.] 1. In zoöl. and anthrop.: (a) Having one male or husband; living in monandry; monogamous, as a female. (b) Relating to monandry: as, a monandrous system or custom.—2. In bot., having a single stamen; belonging to or having the characters of the class Monandria.

Monandrous Flower of Mare's-tail (Hippuris vulgaris) in the axil of the leaf.

monandry (mō-nan'dri), n. [< Gr. μονανδρία, the having but one husband, < μόνανδρος, having but one husband: see monandrous.] The monandrous state; the practice of having only one husband.

Once introduced, monandry must necessarily spread in proportion as life becomes easier; for a man to have a wife to himself must be the respectable thing, and with this there will go a corresponding progress towards civilised ideas of conjugal fidelity. W. R. Smith, Kinship and Marriage, p. 141.

monanthous (mō-nan'thus), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + ἄνθος, flower.] In bot., producing but one flower: said of a plant or peduncle.

monarch (mon'ärk), n. [Early mod. E. monarke; < OF. (and F.) monarque = Sp. monarca = Pg. monarcha = It. monarca, < LL. monarcha, < Gr. μονάρχης, μόναρχος, ruling alone, a monarch, dictator, a sovereign (cf. μοναρχεῖν, rule alone), < μόνος, alone, + ἀρχειν, rule.] 1. The chief of a monarchy; a supreme governor for life, entitled variously emperor (or empress), king (or queen), czar (or czarina), sultan, shah, etc.; primarily, a sole or autocratic ruler of a state, but in modern times generally a hereditary sovereign with more or less limited powers. See monarchy.

It [mercy] becomes
The throned monarch better than his crown.
Shak., M. of V., iv. 1. 189.

The Sovereign, if a single person, is or should be called a Monarch. Maine, Early Hist. of Institutions, p. 350.

2. Any possessor of absolute power or superiority; one who or that which holds a dominating or preëminent position, literally or figuratively: as, the oak is the monarch of the forest.

Come, thou monarch of the vine,
Plumpy Bacchus with pink eyne!
Shak., A. and C., ii. 7 (song).

I am monarch of all I survey,
My right there is none to dispute.
Cowper, Alexander Selkirk.

=Syn. 1. King, etc. (see prince), potentate, autocrat, despot.

Monarcha (mō-närʹkä), n. [NL., < LL. monarcha, a monarch: see monarch.] An extensive genus of true flycatchers, of the family Muscicapidæ, founded by Vigors and Horsfield in 1826. It contains about 25 species, especially characteristic of Australia, New Guinea, the Moluccas, and Polynesia. They are birds of brilliant and variegated coloration.

monarchal (mō-närʹkal), a. [= It. monarcale; as monarch + -al.] Of or pertaining to a monarch; befitting a monarch; sovereign.

The princes' persons being in all monarchal governments the very knot of the people's welfare.
Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, v.

Satan, whom now transcendent glory raised Above his fellows, with monarchal pride, Conscious of highest worth, unmoved thus spake.
Milton, P. L., ii. 428.

monarchess† (monʹärkes), n. [< monarch + -ess.] A female monarch; a queen or empress.

The monarchess of the four-corner'd earth.
Middleton, Solomon Paraphrased, viii.

Rome, what made her such a Monarchesse, but onely the aduentures of her youth, not in riots at home, but in dangers abroad? Capt. John Smith, Works, II. 197.

monarchia (mō-närʹki-ä), n. [LL.: see monarchy.] In theol., same as monarchy, 5.

monarchial (mō-närʹki-al), a. [< LL. monarchia, monarchy (see monarchy), + -al.] Same as monarchical.

If all the evils which can arise among us from the republican form of our government, from this day to the day of judgment, could be put into a scale against what this country suffers from its monarchial form in a week, . . . the latter would be preponderate.
Jefferson, Correspondence, II. 205.

Monarchian (mō-närʹki-an), n. [= F. monarchien = Pg. monarchiano; < Gr. μονάρχης, monarch, μοναρχία, monarchy: see monarchy and -an.] One of a body of Antitrinitarian Christians in the latter part of the second and the third century. They were divided into two groups—the dynamic (dynamistic) or rationalistic Monarchians, who regarded Christ as filled with a divine power and denied his divinity, and the Patripassians, who regarded the Father and the Son as the same; the latter were called modalistic Monarchians, from their advocacy of a threefold mode or manifestation of the deity.

By monarchians of the former [dynamistic] class Christ was held to be a mere man, miraculously conceived indeed, but constituted the Son of God simply by the infinitely high degree in which he had been filled with Divine wisdom and power. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 719.

Monarchianism (mō-närʹki-an-izm), n. [< Monarchian + -ism.] The theological doctrine respecting the Godhead maintained by the Monarchians.

Modalistic monarchianism, conceiving that the wholefulness of the Godhead dwelt in Christ, took exception to the "subordinatianism" of some church writers, and maintained that the names Father and Son were only two different designations of the same subject, the one God, who "with reference to the relations in which He had previously stood to the world is called the Father, but in reference to His appearance in humanity is called the Son."
Encyc. Brit., XVI. 719.

monarchianistic (mō-närʹki-a-nisʹtik), a. [< Monarchian + -istic.] Relating to or resembling the theory of the Monarchians.

Monarchianistic comparisons of Augustine.
Ueberweg, Hist. Philos. (trans.), I.

monarchic (mō-närʹkik), a. [< F. monarchique = Sp. monárquico = Pg. monarchico = It. monarchico, < Gr. μοναρχικός, of a monarch or monarchical, < μόναρχος, a monarch: see monarch, monarchy.] Relating or pertaining to a monarch or to monarchy; monarchical.

The monarchick and aristocratical and popular partisans have been jointly laying their axes to the root of all government. Burke, Vind. of Nat. Society.

Without justice all forms, democratic or monarchic, are tyrannical alike. Froude, Cæsar, p. 190.

monarchical (mō-närʹki-kal), a. [< monarchic + -al.] 1. Pertaining to a monarch or to monarchy; characteristic of or subject to a monarch; of the nature of monarchy: as, monarchical rule or methods; a monarchical country or government.

Monarchical their State,
But prudently confined, and mingled wise
Of each harmonious power. Thomson, Liberty, iv.

In a monarchical state in which the constitution is strongest, the laws may be relaxed without danger.
Goldsmith, Citizen of the World, i.

It is not impossible that the political movements of our time, which seem on the surface to have a tendency to democracy, may have in reality a monarchical bias.
Disraeli.

2. Of or pertaining to government by a monarch.

It was not the Monarchical way of Government that was so displeasing to God or Samuel; for their Government was of that Form already. Stillingfleet, Sermons, II. iv.

3. Regarding monarchy as the best form of government; adhering to the principles of monarchy. The name Monarchical party was often applied to the Federalists of the United States by their opponents.

Also monarchial.

=Syn. See prince and royal.

monarchically (mō-närʹki-kal-i), adv. In the form of a monarchy, or in accordance with the principles or methods of monarchical government.

monarchise, monarchiser. See monarchize, monarchizer.

monarchism (monʹär-kizm), n. [< F. monarchisme = Sp. monarquismo; as monarch + -ism.] The principles of monarchy; love of or preference for monarchy.

monarchist (monʹär-kist), n. [< F. monarchiste = Sp. monarquista = Pg. It. monarchista; as monarch + -ist.] An advocate of or believer in monarchy; one who holds or maintains monarchical principles.

I proceed to examine the next supposition of the church monarchists, which is, That Saint Peter's primacy with its rights and prerogatives was not personal but derivable to his successors. Barrow, On the Pope's Supremacy.

There is no Frenchman, be he Republican or Monarchist, who does not feel this insult. Lowe, Bismarck, II. 141.

monarchize (monʹär-kīz), v.; pret. and pp. monarchized, ppr. monarchizing. [= F. monarchiser; as monarch + -ize.] I. intrans. To play the king; act as a monarch.

Allowing him a breath, a little scene
To monarchize, be fear'd, and kill with looks.
Shak., Rich. II., iii. 2. 165.

II. trans. 1. To rule over as a monarch.

By whom three sever'd Realms in one shall firmly stand,
As Britain-founding Brute first monarchized the Land.
Drayton, Polyolbion, v. 68.

2. To convert into a monarchy.

So far we shall be from mending our condition by monarchizing our Government, whatever new Conceit now possesses us. Milton, Free Commonwealth.

[In all senses obsolete or unusual.]

Also spelled monarchise.

monarchizer (monʹär-kī-zėr), n. One who plays the monarch, or upholds monarchy; a monarchist. Also spelled monarchiser. [Rare.]

Let the pride
Of these our irreligious monarchisers
Be crown'd in blood.
Heywood, Rape of Lucrece, iii.

monarchy (mon′är-ki), n.; pl. monarchies (-kiz). [< ME. monarchie = F. monarchie = Sp. monarquía = Pg. It. monarchia, < LL. monarchia, < Gr. μοναρχία, absolute rule, sole power, monarchy, < μόναρχος, a sovereign, monarch: see monarch.] 1. Supreme power wielded by a single person; absolute personal authority.

They imagined that he [Jesus] . . . should subdue the rest of the world, and make Jerusalem the seat of an universal monarchy. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, vii. 16.

But let us not deceive our selves, the pretensions are as high and as great at Rome to this Monarchy as ever they were. Stillingfleet, Sermons, II. ii.

2. The principle of government by a monarch; the monarchical system.

The first, the most ancient, most general, and most approved, was the government of one ruling by just laws, called monarchy. Raleigh, Hist. World, I. ix. 2.

I hear there are people among you who think the experience of our governments has already proved that republican governments will not answer. Send those gentry here, to count the blessings of monarchy.
Jefferson, Correspondence, II. 221.

3. A government in which the supreme power is either actually or nominally lodged in the hands of a monarch or sole ruler, who holds his position for life, generally with hereditary succession. There have been elective monarchies, in which the successor to a deceased sovereign was chosen without obligatory regard to the hereditary principle; but this principle has finally prevailed, to the exclusion of choice, in all existing civilized monarchies. The former kingdom of Poland was a purely elective monarchy. The German-Roman empire was originally, and always nominally, elective; but for many centuries the chosen successor was almost invariably the heir of the former emperor. An absolute or despotic monarchy is one in which the will of the monarch or sovereign is supreme over all other authority or powers of government; a limited or constitutional monarchy, one in which the sovereign is limited to the exercise of particular powers or functions by the laws or constitution of the realm. More or less limited monarchies have nearly always existed. About the fifteenth century a noteworthy increase of the power of the sovereign took place (as in England under Edward IV., in France under Louis XI., in Spain under Ferdinand the Catholic and Charles V.). Till the close of the eighteenth century the prevalent theory and practice on the continent constituted nearly unrestricted absolutism; this has now almost disappeared from Europe, while still maintaining a foothold in Asia. But whether absolute or limited, the monarch is theoretically regarded as the source of all power, and all acts of government are done in his name.

The obvious definition of a monarchy seems to be that of a state in which a single person, by whatsoever name he may be distinguished, is intrusted with the execution of the laws, the management of the revenue, and the command of the army. But, unless public liberty is protected by intrepid and vigilant guardians, the authority of so formidable a magistrate will soon degenerate into despotism. Gibbon.

It has often indeed been noticed that a Feudal Monarchy was an exact counterpart of a Feudal Manor, but the reason of the correspondence is only now beginning to dawn upon us. Maine, Early Hist. of Institutions, p. 77.

4. The territory ruled over by a monarch; a kingdom; an empire.

What scourge for perjury
Can this dark monarchy afford false Clarence?
Shak., Rich. III., i. 4. 51.

5. In theol., the doctrine that there is in the Godhead only one principle (ἀρχή), cause (αἰτία), source or fountain (πηγή) of deity, namely God the Father, from whom the Son and the Holy Ghost derive their divinity. Also monarchia.—Fifth Monarchy Men. See fifth.

Monarda (mō-närʹdä), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), named after N. Monardés, a Spanish physician and botanist of the 16th century.] A genus of labiate plants, type of the tribe Monardeæ, characterized by the anthers having a very small connective, the cells confluent into one, and by having a tubular calyx with fifteen nerves, which is almost equally five-toothed. They are odorous erect herbs with entire or toothed leaves, and quite large flowers arranged in a few terminal or whorled heads, surrounded by many bracts, and varying in color, being bright-red, purple, white, and in one species pale-yellow. About 10 species are known, all natives of North America. M. punctata, the American horsemint, is stimulant and carminative. M. didyma, the Oswego tea, or bee-balm, has bright-scarlet flowers. M. fistulosa is the wild bergamot.

Branch of Oswego Tea (Monarda didyma), with flowers.

Monardeæ (mō-närʹdē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham, 1833), < Monarda + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the family Menthaceæ. It embraced 11 genera, Monarda being the type, and about 490 species. In Engler's system this tribe is restricted to the genera Monarda and Blephilia, most of the other genera being placed in the tribes Salvieæ and Meriandriæ, but Ziziphora is referred to the Saturejeæ and Rosmarinus is made the type of a distinct tribe.

monardin (mō-närʹdin), n. [< Monarda + *-in*2.] A crystalline solid which separates from the oil of horsemint, Monarda punctata. It is identical with thymol.

monarsenous (mon-ärʹse-nus), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + ἄρσην, male.] In zoöl., having but one male for several females.

monarticular (mon-är-tikʹū-lär), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + L. articulus, a joint: see articular.] In pathol., affecting a single joint.

monas (monʹas), n. [NL., < LL. monas, a unit: see monad.] 1. A monad; a monadiform infusorian.—2. [cap.] The typical genus of Monadidæ. M. lens is an example.—Monas prodigiosa, Bacillus prodigiosus. This microscopic organism forms short rods; it is not pathogenic, but is found on starchy substances, such as bread, rice, and potatoes, also on milk. It produces a red pigment, and it or the substances which it discolors are sometimes called blood-rain, bleeding bread, bleeding host, and red milk.

Monasa (monʹa-sä), n. [NL. (Vieillot, 1816), an error for Monacha: see Monacha.] A genus of South American barbets or puff-birds, of the family Bucconidæ; the nun-birds or monases. There are seven species, of comparatively large size, with somber blackish plumage usually relieved with white on the face or wings, and coral-red bills, as M. nigra, M. morpheus, and M. nigrifrons. Also Monasta, Monastes, Monacha, Lypornix, and Scotocharis. See cut at nun-bird.

Monascidiæ (mon-a-sidʹi-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, alone, + NL. Ascidiæ.] A superfamily group of tunicates, the Ascidiæ simplices; the sea-squirts; simple and either solitary or social ascidians.

monascidian (mon-a-sidʹi-an), a. and n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + E. ascidian.] I. a. Simple, as an ascidian; not composite or compound, as many ascidians are; of or pertaining to the Monascidiæ.

II. n. A member of the Monascidiæ; an ordinary sea-squirt.

monase (monʹās), n. [< F. monase, NL. Monasa: see Monasa.] A fissirostral barbet of the genus Monasa; a nun-bird.

monaster (mon-asʹtėr), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + ἀστήρ, star.] In embryol., the original aster or single-star figure which occurs in the process of karyokinesis; distinguished from diaster or dyaster.

monasterial (mon-as-tēʹri-al), a. [= Sp. monasterial = It. monasteriale, < LL. monasterialis, of a monastery, < monasterium, a monastery: see monastery.] Of or pertaining to a monastery.

One of the bishops had been in solitary confinement in this monasterial prison 17 years.
The Century, XXXV. 56, note.

monasterially (mon-as-tēʹri-al-i), adv. Monastically.

It is not the habit that makes the monk, many being monasterially accoutred who inwardly are nothing less than monachal.
Urquhart, tr. of Rabelais, i., Author's Prol. (Davies.) monastery (monʹas-te-ri), n.; pl. monasteries (-riz). [In early form minster, q. v.; = F. monastère = Sp. monasterio = Pg. mosteiro = It. monasterio = OBulg. monastyri, monostyri = Serv. manastir = Pol. monasterz = Hung. monostor (< Slav.), < LL. monasterium, < Gr. μοναστήριον, a solitary dwelling, in LGr. a monastery, cf. LGr. μοναστήριος, adj., Gr. μοναστής, a solitary, LGr. a monk, < μονάζειν, be alone, dwell alone, < μόνος, alone: see monad. Cf. monk, from the same ult. source.] A house or other place of residence occupied in common by persons seeking religious seclusion from the world: commonly applied to such a house exclusively used by monks. The term, however, strictly includes the abbey, the priory, the nunnery, and the friary, and in this broad use is synonymous with convent. Monasteries in the Christian church were probably first established in the fourth century. St. Benedict of Nursia in the sixth century established a monastic rule which has been the foundation of nearly all the rules which govern monastic vows. Vows under different rules were made from the beginning of Christianity. The number of monasteries in Europe was much diminished at the Reformation, when their rich estates were in part appropriated by sovereigns to their own use, and in part transferred to universities and other educational institutions, etc. We owe to the monasteries the first definite beginnings or revival of civilization in many countries, especially Germany and France, almost all the missionary work of the early middle ages, and the preservation of nearly all ancient classical and early medieval literature. The monastic life has been practised from pre-Christian times among the Buddhists. See rule.

The hypocrites hath loste their more than pryncely habitacions, theyr monasteries, conuentes, hospitalles, prebendaries and chaunteryes, with theyr fatte fedyng and warme couches, for yl gotten good wyl home agayne.
Bp. Bale, Image of the Two Churches, i.

Abbeuile is a goodly faire Citie, . . . wherein . . . are many Monasteries of men and women.
Coryat, Crudities, I. 13.

The ancient Monastery's halls,
A solemn, huge, and dark red pile
Placed on the margin of the isle.
Scott, Marmion, ii. 9.

The eastern monasteries, with the important exception of a vow of obedience, differed little from a collection of hermitages. They were in the deserts; the monks commonly lived in separate cells; they kept silence at their repasts; they rivaled one another in the extravagance of their penances. Lecky, Europ. Morals, II. 121.

Mitered monastery. See miter.—Monasteries' Dissolution Acts, English statutes of 1536 and 1539, vesting in the king certain monasteries and other religious houses, and the rights and property belonging to them.

monastic (mō-nasʹtik), a. and n. [< F. monastique = Sp. monástico = Pg. It. monastico, < LGr. μοναστικός, living in solitude, pertaining to a monk, < μοναστής, a monk: see monastery.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to or characteristic of monks or nuns; ascetic: as, monastic life, vows, or practices.

The clergy, and the monastic orders especially, had been good farmers. Stubbs Const. Hist., § 464.

2. Adapted to or suitable for monks or nuns; of ascetic character or use: as, monastic buildings or architecture; monastic seclusion.

To forswear the full stream of the world, and to live in a nook merely monastic. Shak., As you Like it, iii. 2. 442.

The grounds of the villa, raised on the ancient walls of the monastic precinct, look down at once on the waves of Hadria. E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 298.

3. An epithet noting a style of book-decoration in which medieval forms of compact ornament are strongly stamped on the sides or back of the book without any use of gold-leaf.—Monastic bishop, in the ancient Celtic churches of Ireland and Scotland, and sometimes in other countries in the earlier middle ages—(a) an abbot who was also a bishop; or (b) a monk consecrated bishop, resident in a monastery, and exercising his office in confirmations, ordinations, etc., but without jurisdiction.—Monastic vows, the vows imposed under monastic rule. They are three in number, poverty, chastity, and obedience.

II. n. A monk; a religious recluse.

An art . . . preserved amongst the monasticks.
Sir T. Herbert, Travels in Africa, p. 143.

It seems plain that the treble value was intended specially to protect the new monastics in their tithes by heightening the peril of disputing them.
R. W. Dixon, Hist. Church of Eng., xv.

monastical (mō-nasʹti-kal), a. [< monastic + -al.] Same as monastic.

monastically (mō-nasʹti-kal-i), adv. In a monastic manner; in a retired manner; after the manner of monks. Swift.

monasticism (mō-nasʹti-sizm), n. [< monastic + -ism.] 1. The corporate life of religious communities under the vows of poverty, celibacy, and obedience to a superior; the monastic system or condition.

It may be questioned whether anything but monasticism could have kept the church and clergy free from the political combinations and dangers of the early time.
Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 84.

2. The condition or state of living like a monk, in religious retirement from the world.

In older Anglo-Saxon Britain monasticism itself had but seldom aspired either to the dreamy quietude of the East or the passionate and excessive austerity of the West: it was a religious profession, no more.
Milman, Latin Christianity, vii. 1.

monasticon (mō-nasʹti-kon), n. [< LGr. μοναστικόν, neut. of μοναστικός, monastic: see monastic.] A book relating to or describing monasteries.

monatomic (mon-a-tomʹik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + ἄτομος, atom.] 1. Having the same valence as hydrogen, represented by unity.—2. Having but one atom in the molecule.

monaul (mo-nâlʹ), n. [Also monal, manaul, minaul; Hind. munāl, monāl.] A pheasant; specifically, an impeyan, or pheasant of the genus Lophophorus, and especially L. impeyanus. See cut under Impeyan pheasant.

The magnificent Monauls, Lophophorus.
A. Newton, Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 733.

monaulos (mō-nâ′los), n.; pl. monauli (-lī). [L., also monaulus, < Gr. μόναυλος, a single flute, < μόνος, single, + αὐλός, pipe, flute.] A Greek flute or flageolet consisting of a single pipe or reed, as opposed to the diaulos, or double flute.

Monaulus (mō-nâ′lus), n. [NL. (Vieillot, 1816), < monaul.] A genus of Phasianidæ; the monauls: same as Lophophorus.

monaural (mon-â′rạl), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + L. auris = E. ear[1]: see aural[2].] 1. Having only one ear.—2. Referring to or involving the use of a single ear.

Direction cannot be appreciated by monaural observation. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXIII. 87.

monaxial (mon-ak′si-ạl), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + L. axis, axis: see axial.] Having but one axis; uniaxial.

monaxon (mon-ak′son), a. and n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + ἄξων, axis: see axon.] I. a. Having one axis, as a sponge-spicule; monaxial. Also monaxonial.

II. n. A sponge-spicule of the group Monaxonia.

Monaxonia (mon-ak-sō′ni-ạ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + ἄξων, axis.] Monaxon or uniaxial sponge-spicules, having one straight or curved axis.

monaxonial (mon-ak-sō′ni-ạl), a. [< monaxon + -ial.] Same as monaxon.

monaxonic (mon-ak-son′ik), a. [< monaxon + -ic.] Having but one axis; uniaxial.

A spherical (homaxonic) or cone-shaped (monaxonic) perforated shell of membranous consistence known as the central capsule. Encyc. Brit., XIX. 849.

Monaxonida (mon-ak-son′i-dạ), n. pl. [NL., < Monaxonia + -ida.] A suborder of sponges, of the order Chondrospongiæ, having monaxon spicules or being without supporting skeleton, the spicules tylostylar and usually situated radially. It includes such families as Tethyidæ, Sollasellidæ, Spirastrellidæ, Suberamatidæ, and Suberitidæ. Lendenfeld.

monazite (mon′ạ-zīt), n. [Irreg. < Gr. μονάζειν, be solitary: see monastery.] A phosphate of the cerium metals, usually containing some thorium silicate. It is a rare mineral, occurring in small brownish-red or yellowish-brown monoclinic crystals, also massive with resinous luster, and is found at Norwich in Connecticut, in North Carolina, among the Urals, and elsewhere. It is a prominent accessory constituent of granitic rocks in some localities, and when these rocks have been disintegrated by natural causes it has been (as in North Carolina and Brazil) obtained, by washing the gravels, in very large quantities.

monck†, n. An obsolete spelling of monk.

Moncrieff gun-carriage. See gun-carriage.

Monday (mun′dā), n. [< ME. Monday, Monenday, < AS. mōnandæg, rarely contr. mōndæg (= OFries. mōnendei, mōnadei = D. maandag = MLG. mândach, manendach = OHG. mānetac, MHG. māntac, G. montag = Icel. mānadagr = Sw. måndag = Dan. mandag), Monday, lit. 'moon's day,' < mōnan, gen. of mōna, moon, + dæg, day: see moon[1] and day[1]. The day was so called after its name in L., dies lunæ, lunæ dies (> F. lundi), tr. Gr. ἡ τῆς Σελήνης ἡμέρα, 'the moon's day.' See week.] The second day of the week.

The next according to the course of the dayes of the week was the idoll of the moone, whereof we yet retaine the name of Monday instead of Mooneday.
Verstegan, Restitution of Decayed Intelligence, iii.

Black Monday. (a) Easter Monday, the 14th of April, 1360. See the quotation.

The 14 day of April and the morrow after Easter day, King Edward [III.] with his hoast lay before the citty of Paris, which day was full darke of mist and haile and so bitter cold that many men dyed on their horses with cold; wherefore vnto this day it hath beene called the Blacke Munday. Stow, Annals, p. 264.

Hence—(b) Any Easter Monday.

Then it was not for nothing that my nose fell a-bleeding on Black-Monday last. Shak., M. of V., ii. 5. 25.

(c) The first Monday after schoolboys' holidays.—Blue Monday, the Monday before Lent: so called in Bavaria, from the color with which churches are ornamented on that day.—Cobbler's Monday, Collop Monday, Handsel Monday. See the qualifying words.

Mondayish (mun′dā-ish), a. [< Monday + -ish[1].] Tired; worn out; weary: said of clergymen who suffer from fatigue after their Sunday services. [Colloq.]

mondaynet, a. An obsolete form of mundane.

monembryony (mon-em′bri-ō-ni), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + ἔμβρυον, an embryo.] The condition of having only one embryo.

mone-pins†, n. pl. A variant of mun-pins (teeth).

moner (mō′nėr), n. [< NL. moneron, q. v.] An organism having the form of a non-nucleated protoplasmic body, in which no definite structure can be discerned. The moners consist of indifferent protoplasm containing no nucleus or endoplast, and thus are conveniently, if not naturally, distinguished from the higher series of protozoans known as Endoplastica.

Monera (mō-nē′rạ), n. pl. [NL., pl. of moneron.] 1. Haeckel's name of a class of protozoans of the simplest possible characters. The Monera are apparently structureless particles of protoplasm, agreeing with other rhizopods in protruding pseudopods, but differing from the normal amœboids in lacking any recognizable nucleus. Unlike foraminifers, they form no shell. The group is provisional, and perhaps hypothetical. The name is that of a legitimate biological conception; but since it is by no means certain that every moner is not a stage or state of a somewhat more definitely organized rhizopod, the group so named has no assured zoölogical standing. The Monera are sometimes nominally divided into Gymnomonera and Lepomonera, the former of which are always naked, while the latter may acquire a cell-wall. Also Monerozoa.

2. [l. c.] Plural of moneron.

moneral (mō-nē′rạl), a. [< Monera + -al.] Same as moneran.

moneran (mō-nē′rạn), a. and n. [< Monera + -an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to a moner, or to the Monera. Also moneric, moneral.

II. n. A moner or moneron.

monergism (mon′ėr-jizm), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + ἔργον, = E. work (see erg), + -ism.] In theol., the doctrine that the Holy Spirit is the only efficient agent in regeneration—that the human will possesses no inclination to holiness until regenerated, and therefore cannot coöperate in regeneration.

moneric (mō-nē′rik), a. [< Monera + -ic.] Same as moneran. W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 394.

moneron (mō-nē′ron), n.; pl. monera (-rạ). [NL., irreg. < Gr. μονήρης, single, solitary, < μόνος, single (see monad), + ἀραρίσκειν (√ ἀρ), join, fit (cf. διήρης, doubly fitted).] A moner.

Each individual living particle of this structureless mass [protoplasm] is called a Moneron.
Haeckel, Evolution of Man (trans.), II. 31.

To put his [Haeckel's] views into a few words, he conceives that all forms of life originally commenced as moners, or simple particles of protoplasm, and that these monera originated from not-living matter. Huxley.

Monerozoa (mō-nē-rō-zō′ạ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μονήρης, single, solitary (see moneron), + ζῷον, an animal.] Same as Monera. Haeckel.

monerozoan (mō-nē-rō-zō′ạn), a. and n. [< Monerozoa + -an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Monera or Monerozoa.

II. n. A moner or moneron.

monerozoic (mō-nē-rō-zō′ik), a. [< Monerozoa + -ic.] Same as monerozoan. W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 473.

monerula (mō-ner′ụ-lạ), n.; pl. monerulæ (-lē). [NL., dim., < Gr. μονήρης, single, solitary: see moneron.] In embryol., a name given by Haeckel to a supposed non-nucleated stage of an impregnated ovum, when it has the form-value of a simple cytode, or moner. It is supposed that the nucleated ovum, immediately upon fecundation by spermatozoa, undergoes retrogressive metamorphosis, loses its nucleus, and becomes a mere mass of protoplasm; that then a new nucleus is formed, in the formation of which the spermatic protoplasm takes part; and that thereupon the ovum resumes its form-value of a nucleated cell as a cytula, having been a monerula in the interval between the loss of the original nucleus and the acquisition of the new one. But his views on this point have been shown to be erroneous.

Moneses (mō-nē′sēz), n. [NL. (Salisbury, 1821), prob. so named on account of the pretty and solitary flower; < Gr. μόνος, alone, + ἠσις, delight.] A genus of plants belonging to the family Pyrolaceæ, characterized by spreading petals, by the capsule opening upward from the base, and by solitary flowers. There is but a single species, M. uniflora, the one-flowered pyrola, which is a small perennial with rounded and veiny serrate leaves and a scape bearing a white or rose-colored flower. It is a native of middle and northern Europe, Asia, and the colder parts of America.

monesia (mō-nē′sị-ạ), n. [Origin uncertain.] A vegetable extract thought to be derived from the bark of Achras glyciphlœa, exported from Brazil in hard thick cakes. It seems to have some stomachic, alterative, and astringent properties.—Monesia bark. See Chrysophyllum.

monesin (mō-nē′sin), n. [< monesia + -in[2].] An acrid principle obtained from monesia, and considered identical with saponin.

monestet, v. t. A Middle English form of monish.

monetagium (mon-e-tā′ji-um), n. [ML.] Same as moneyage, 2.

monetarily (mon′- or mun′e-tạ-ri-li), adv. As regards monetary affairs; from a monetary point of view; financially.

monetary (mon′- or mun′e-tạ-ri), a. [= F. monétaire = Sp. monetario = Pg. monetario, moedeiro = It. monetario, pertaining to money, < L. monetarius, pertaining to the mint; as a noun, a mint-master, a minter; < moneta, mint, money: see money. Cf. minter, ult. < L. monetarius.] 1. Pertaining to money; consisting of money.—2. Financial.—Monetary chain, a chain of precious metal each link of which is of definite weight or value: such links were formerly used as money.—Monetary unit, the unit of currency. In the United States this is the gold dollar, having a standard weight of 25.8 grains. The unit is the pound in the British empire, the franc in France, the mark in Germany.

moneth, monethly†. Obsolete forms of month, monthly.

monetization (mon″- or mun″e-ti-zā′shọn), n. [= F. monétisation; as monetize + -ation.] The act of monetizing; the act or process of giving something the character of money or of coining it into money: as, the monetization of silver.

monetize (mon′- or mun′e-tīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. monetized, ppr. monetizing. [< L. moneta, money (see money), + -ize.] To give the character of money to; legalize as money; coin into money.

money (mun′i), n. [Formerly also mony, monie; < ME. moneye, mone, monoye, < OF. moneie, monoie, monnoye, F. monnaie = Pr. Sp. moneda = Pg. moeda = It. moneta, < L. moneta, mint, money: see mint[1], which is also ult. from L. moneta, and thus a doublet of money.] 1. Coin, or, more strictly, current coin; stamped metal that may be given in exchange for commodities; gold, silver, or other metal, stamped by public authority and used as the medium of exchange: in this sense used only collectively.

Forthe thei went alle thre
To pay the scheperde his moné.
MS. Cantab. Ff. v. 48, f. 53. (Halliwell.)

Every man also gave him a piece of money. Job lxii. 11.

2. In a wider sense, any article of value which is generally accepted as a medium of exchange; also, by extension, something which, though possessing little or no intrinsic value, is recognized and accepted as a substitute for money as above defined, such as paper money; any circulating medium of exchange. Money is adopted for the sake of convenience to facilitate the exchange of one kind of wealth for another and as a standard of value. Its common form is that of a stamped metallic currency; but in primitive times, among uncivilized peoples, and under special conditions by civilized people, many other articles have been used as money. Bank-notes, greenbacks, gold and silver certificates of the United States government, etc., all representing coin, are called paper money, and are used for convenience instead of the coin itself. Money in this sense is not often used in the plural, unless to indicate sums of money or different systems of money or coinage. See def. 4.

Importune him for my moneys. Shak., T. of A., ii. 1. 16.

Every lady should meet her lord,
When he is newly come frae sea;
Some wi' hawks, and some wi hounds,
And other some wi' gay monie.
The Knight's Ghost (Child's Ballads, I. 210).

What moneys I have is at your disposing; and upon twelve I will meet you at the palace with it.
Beau. and Fl., Honest Man's Fortune, ii. 2.

There are several different sorts of paper money; but the circulating notes of banks and bankers are the species which is best known, which seems best adapted for this purpose. Adam Smith, Wealth of Nations, II. ii.

Money is bought and sold like other things, whenever other things are bought and sold for money. Whoever sells corn, or tallow, or cotton, buys money.
J. S. Mill, Pol. Econ., III. viii. § 2.

Our ancestors in Maryland and Virginia, before the revolutionary war, and for some time after, in default of gold and silver, used tobacco as money, made it money by law, reckoned the fees and salaries of government officers in tobacco, and collected the public taxes in that article.
Cyc. of Pol. Sci., II. 879.

Money is the medium of exchange. Whatever performs this function, does this work, is money, no matter what it is made of, and no matter how it came to be a medium at first, or why it continues to be such.
Walker, Pol. Econ., III. iii. 144.

With the aid of money all the difficulties of barter disappear; for money consists of some commodity which all people in the country are willing to receive in exchange, and which can be divided into quantities of any amount. Almost any commodity might be used as money in the absence of a better material. In agricultural countries corn was so used in former times.
Jevons, Pol. Econ., p. 104.

3. Property, in whatever form, which is readily convertible into or serves the same purposes as money as above defined; available assets; wealth: as, a man of money.

The moneye on this molde that men so faste holden,
Tel me to whom that tresour appendeth?
Piers Plowman (A), i. 43.

Money can neither open new avenues to pleasure, nor block up the passages of anguish. Johnson.

Money, taken in the largest sense, as the representative of all kinds of property, is one of the greatest means of human education. J. F. Clarke, Self-Culture, p. 266.

4. The currency of any country or nation; a denomination or designation of value, whether represented in the coinage or not: in this sense also used in the plural: as, English money; the weights and moneys of different nations; a money of account.

For right als thai boght ihesu fre
For thritty penis of thaire moné,
So war thai sold to thaire enmy
Euer thritty iews for a peny.
Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 89.

Words are the tokens current and accepted for conceits, as moneys are for values.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii. 235.

5. A way or line of investing money. [Colloq. or vulgar.]

I sell dry fruit, sir, in February and March, because I must be doing something, and green fruit 's not my money then. Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, I. 95.

Acknowledgment money. See acknowledgment.—Added money. See add.—Bent money, bowed money, a coin purposely bent and given as a love-token, or in certain cases used as a votive offering. Such coins seem to have been bent to prevent their use as money.

I bequeathe him my rope of bowed nobles that I hang my great whistle containing CCC angels.
Will of Sir Edward Howard, 1512, in Archæologia, [XXXVIII. 370.

Cargo money or Guinea money, a peculiar species of porcelain shell used as money in Guinea.—China money, the name given (in the provincial form chany or "chainé" money) to tokens of porcelain issued by the Pinxton China Works in East Derbyshire. They were oval, plano-convex in section, and bore on the convex side their value in large figures, as 5*s.*, 7*s.* See china-token.—Coat-and-conduct money. See coat[2].—Conscience money. See conscience.—Covered money, a technical phrase used in United States legislation and administration for money which has been deposited in the Treasury in the usual manner, and which can be drawn out only to pay an appropriation made by Congress.—Creation money, effective money, fairy money. See the qualifying words.—Fiat money paper currency issued by a government as money, but not based on coin or bullion; paper currency containing no promise to pay coin, and therefore not convertible into coin. [Colloq.]

This overflowing deluge of fiat money alarmed and dissipated the old-fashioned gold and silver coins of our progenitors. The Century, XXXVI. 763.

Fiddler's money. See fiddler.—For love or money. See love[1].—For money, for cash: on the stock exchange, in the case of a contract for money, the securities sold are transferred immediately to a designated name, and the broker for the buyer pays for them: distinguished from for the account (which see, under account).—For my money†, to my mind; what I prefer.

A horn for my money. Shak., Much Ado, ii. 3. 63.

Guinea money. See cargo money.—Hammered money. See hammer[1].—Hard money, metallic money; coin. [U. S.]

I du believe hard coin the stuff
Fer 'lectioneers to spout on;

To make hard money out on.
Lowell, Biglow Papers, 1st ser., vi.

Imprest money. See imprest[2].—Kimmeridge-coal money, small circular pieces of shale two or three inches in diameter and a quarter of an inch thick, bearing the marks of having been turned in a lathe, found near Smedmore in the parish of Great Kimmeridge, in Dorset, England, in the soil, two or three feet from the surface.

It is considered probable that the Kimeridge coal-money may be simply the refuse from which rings or armlets have been turned in a lathe, or they may be the bases of vases or bowls.
H. B. Woodward, Geol. of Eng. and Wales, 2d ed., p. 336.

Lawful, lucky, maundy, milled money. See the qualifying words.—Money makes the mare go. See mare[1].—Money of account. See account.—Money of necessity. See necessity.—Money on call. See call[1].—Paper money. See def. 2.—Pot of money, a large amount of money; a heavy sum. [Colloq.]—Present money. Same as ready money.

I am not furnish'd with the present money.
Shak., C. of E., iv. 1. 34.

Ready money, money paid or ready to be paid at the time a transaction is completed; cash: also used adjectively: as, a ready-money purchase.

Hee is your slaue while you pay him ready Money, but if hee once befriend you, your Tyrant, and you had better deserue his hate then his trust.
Bp. Earle, Micro-cosmographie, A Shop-keeper.

Let 's e'en compound, and for the Present Live,
'Tis all the Ready Mony Fate can give.
Cowley, Pindaric Odes, viii. 6.

Right money†, money paid as the condition or consideration of acquiring a right to the purchase of lands.

As no right money is to be paid for these lands, and quit-rent of two shillings sterling a hundred, demandable some years hence only, it is highly presumable that they will always be held upon a more desirable footing than where both these are laid on with a very heavy hand.
Washington, quoted in H. B. Adams, Washington's [Interest in Western Lands.

Soft money, paper money. [Slang, U. S.]—To coin money. See coin[1].—Token money. See token.—To make money, to gain or procure money; become rich.—To take eggs for money. See egg[1].—Value of money. See the quotation.

It will be well to deal with a use of the phrase value of money which has led to much confusion. In mercantile phraseology the value of money means the interest charged for the use of loanable capital. Thus, when the market rate of interest is high, money is said to be dear, when it is low, money is regarded as cheap. Whatever may be the force of the reasons in favour of this use, it is only mentioned here for the purpose of excluding it. For our present subject, the value of a thing is what it will exchange for; the value of money is what money will exchange for, or its purchasing power. If prices are low, money will buy much of other things, and is of high value. The value of money is inversely as general prices, falling as they rise and rising as they fall. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 721.

White money, silver coin; also, coin of base metal imitating silver.

Here's a seal'd bag of a hundred; which indeed
Are counters all, only some sixteen groats
Of white money i' the mouth on 't.
Beau. and Fl., Wit at Several Weapons, ii. 1.

(See also earnest-money, head-money, light-money, pin-money, ship-money.)=Syn. 1 and 2. Money, Cash. Money was primarily minted metal, as copper, brass, silver, gold, but later any circulating medium that took the place of such coins: as, wampum was used as money in trade with the Indians; paper money. Cash is ready money, primarily coin, but now also anything that is accepted as money: it is opposed to credit.

money (mun'i), v. t. [< money, n.] 1. To supply with money.

Knaves have friends, especially when they are well monied. Greene, Conny-Catching, ii.

Hind. Mughal (> E. Mogul), < Mongolian Mongol. Said to be ult. < mong, brave.] I. n. One of an Asiatic race now chiefly resident in Mongolia, a vast region north of China proper and south of Siberia, forming a possession of China. Mongols are also found elsewhere in the Chinese empire and in Asiatic Russia. The Mongols in the thirteenth century conquered a large part of Asia and overran eastern Europe. See Mogul.

II. a. Of or pertaining to Mongolia or the ★Mongols.

Mongolian (mong-gō'li-an), a. and n. [< Mongol + -ian.] I. a. Same as Mongol.—Mongolian race, the second in Blumenbach's classification of the races of mankind. The chief characteristics are as follows: a very short skull, slight superciliary ridges, broad cheek-bones, short and broad nose, and yellowish complexion. It included the Chinese, Turks, Tatars, Indo-Chinese, Lapps, Eskimos, etc.—Mongolian subregion, in zoögeog., a subdivision of the great Palearctic region, stretching eastward from the Caspian Sea to include most if not all of Japan, and lying south of the Siberian subregion; but its boundaries are not well defined. In ornithology this subregion has more peculiar genera than any other one of the Palearctic subdivisions.

II. n. 1. Same as Mongol.—2. By extension, a Chinese, or member of the Mongolian race (according to Blumenbach's classification).—3. The language of the Mongols, a branch of the Ural-Altaic family. It has three principal dialects—Kalmuck, East Mongolian, and Buriatic.

Mongolic (mong-gol'ik), a. [= It. Mongolico; as Mongol + -ic.] Of or pertaining to the Mongols; Mongolian.

Mongolidæ (mong-gol'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Mongol + -idæ.] The Mongols and races regarded as akin to them, according to the classification of certain authorities.

Mongolioid (mong-gō'li-oid), a. and n. [< Mongol (Mongolian) + -oid.] I. a. Resembling the Mongols; having Mongolian characteristics.

II. n. One having physical characters like those of the typical Mongols (including Chinese, Japanese, etc.). Huxley.

Mongoloid (mong'gō-loid), a. and n. [< Mongol + -oid.] Same as Mongolioid.

mongoos, mungoos (mong'-, mung'gös), n. [Also written mongoose, mongooz, mongouz, mongoz, monguz, moongus, mungoose, etc.; F. mongouz, NL. specific name mongoz; < Telugu mangisu, Marathi mangus, a mongoos.] 1. A common ichneumon of India, Herpestes griseus. Being easily domesticated, it is kept in many houses in Hindustan to rid them of reptiles and other vermin, as rats, mice, etc. It is said that it neutralizes the poison of snakes, which it fearlessly attacks, by eating, during its contests with them, the Ophiorhiza Mungos, but its immunity is chiefly due to the extreme celerity of its movements. It is gray in color, flecked with black, and less than the size of a cat. The name is commonly extended to all the related ichneumons of the subfamily Herpestinæ, of which there are several genera and many species; and also to some of the Viverrinæ. All these belong to one family, Viverridæ. See Herpestes, and cut at ichneumon.

2. A species of lemur or maki, Lemur mongoz, having a white color and the tail not ringed: also called mongoos lemur. See maki.

mongrel (mung'grel), n. and a. [Early mod. E. also mungrel, mongril, mongrill, moungrel; < late ME. mengrell for mengerel,* mongerel,* < mang, mong, a mixture (see mong[1]), + -erel, a double dim. (-er[4], -el[2]), as in cockerel, pickerel, etc.] I. n. 1. An individual or a breed of animals resulting from repeated crossing or mixture of several different varieties; the progeny of varieties, and especially of artificial varieties, as distinguished from the hybrid, or cross between two different species (but the distinction is not always observed).

This greater variability in mongrels than in hybrids does not seem at all surprising. For the parents of mongrels are varieties, and mostly domestic varieties, . . . and this implies that there has been recent variability, which would often continue and be added to that arising from the act of crossing. Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 261.

2. Specifically, a dog of mixed breed.

Hounds and greyhounds, mongrels, spaniels, curs,
Shoughs, water-rugs, and demi-wolves are clept
All by the name of dogs. Shak., Macbeth, iii. 1. 93.

The Ounce or wild Cat is as big as a Mungrel.
S. Clarke, Four Plantations in America (1670), p. 33.

3. Anything of mixed breed; anything that is a mixture of incongruous elements.

They say they are gentlemen,
But they shew mungrels.
Fletcher (and another), Sea Voyage, iv. 1.

Dioclesian the Emperour bestowed Elephantina and the parties adioyning on the Blemi and Nobatæ, whose Religion was a mungrell of the Greekish, Egyptian, and their own. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 586.

His two faculties of serving-man and solicitor should compound into one mongrel. Milton, Colasterion.

II. a. Of a mixed or impure breed; begotten or made up of different kinds: usually in a disreputable sense.

There is a mongrel dialect, composed of Italian and French, and some Spanish words are also in it; which they call Franco. Howell, Forreine Travell, p. 53.

mongrel†, v. t. [Formerly also mungrel, moungrel; < mongrel, n.] To make mongrel; mongrelize.

Shal our blood be moungreld with the corruption of a stragling French? Marston, What you Will, i. 1.

mongrelism (mung'grel-izm), n. [< mongrel + -ism.] Mixture of different breeds; the being of mixed breeds.

He [F. Galton] continued his experiments [of transfusion of blood in rabbits] on a still larger scale for two more generations, without any sign of mongrelism showing itself in the very numerous offspring. Darwin, Var. of Animals and Plants, p. 350.

mongrelize (mung'grel-iz), v. t.; pret. and pp. mongrelized, ppr. mongrelizing. [< mongrel + -ize.] To make mongrel; give a mongrel nature or character to.

How . . . comes it that such a vast number of the seedlings are mongrelized? I suspect that it must arise from the pollen of a distinct variety having a prepotent effect over a flower's own pollen, and that this is part of the general law of good being derived from the intercrossing of distinct individuals of the same species. Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 101.

mongrel-skate (mung'grel-skāt), n. The angel-fish, Squatina squatina. [Local, Eng.]

monial[1]†, n. [ME., < OF. monale, a nun, fem. of monial, monastic, < moine, a monk: see monk.] A nun.

moniliformly (mō-nil′i-fôrm-li), adv. In a moniliform manner; in the form of a string of beads.

monilioid (mō-nil′i-oid), a. [< L. monile, a necklace, + Gr. εἶδος, form.] Same as moniliform.

moniment†, n. An obsolete variant of monument.

Monimia (mō-nim′i-ä), n. [NL. (Du Petit-Thouars, 1804), suggested by its affinity to a genus previously named Mithridatea, < L. Monima, < Gr. Μονίμη, wife of Mithridates.] A genus of dicotyledonous apetalous plants, type of the family Monimiaceæ and of the tribe Monimieæ. It is characterized by globose diœcious flowers, the staminate becoming split into four to six lobes, by numerous stamens, each bearing two glands at its base, and by the fruit, which consists of several very small one-seeded drupes inclosed within the enlarged perianth. Three or four species are known, natives of the Mascarene Islands and Madagascar. They are shrubs with rigid opposite leaves, and very small flowers, closely clustered in the axils. Fossil plants of this genus occur in the Tertiary formations of Europe and of Australia, and closely allied forms, called Monimiopsis, at the very base of that formation in France and in the Fort Union group on the Yellowstone river in Montana.

Monimiaceæ (mō-nim-i-ā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Endlicher, 1836), < Monimia + -aceæ.] A family of dicotyledonous archichlamydeous (apetalous) plants of the order Ranales, typified by the genus Monimia. It is characterized by a globose or cup-shaped perianth, toothed or deeply divided at the border, by numerous stamens covering the perianth, and by having several or many distinct ovaries, each with a single ovule, a minute embryo, and copious fleshy albumen. The family includes about 31 genera and 300 species, natives of the warmer parts of South America, Asia, and the South Pacific islands. They are trees, shrubs, or rarely climbers, generally aromatic, with rigid opposite leaves and small flowers, in axillary or sometimes terminal clusters, which are shorter than the leaves. Several furnish wood for cabinet-work.

Monimieæ (mon-i-mī′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. L. de Jussieu, 1809), < Monimia + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the family Monimiaceæ, of which Monimia is the type. It is characterized by the narrowly urceolate, fleshy, or coriaceous receptacle of the female flowers, enlarged after flowering and contracted at the apex. It includes 4 genera and 24 species, natives chiefly of the Mascarene islands and Madagascar, a few in Australia and New Guinea, and one in South America.

monimostylic (mon″i-mō-stī′lik), a. [< Gr. μόνιμος, lasting, stable, + στῦλος, pillar.] Having the quadrate bone fixed, as a skull: correlated with autostylic and hyostylic.

moniourt, n. A Middle English form of moneyer.

moniplies (mon′i-plīz), n. sing. and pl. Same as manyplies. [Scotch.]

monisht (mon′ish), v. t. [< ME. monysshen, monyschen, moneishen, also monesten, < OF. monester, < ML. monistare*, for LL. monitare, freq. of L. monere, warn, admonish, akin to meminisse, remember. Cf. admonish, monition, etc.] To admonish; warn.

monisher (mon′ish-ėr), n. [< ME. monyschere; < monish + *-er*1.] An admonisher. Johnson.

monishment† (mon′ish-ment), n. [< monish + -ment.] Admonition. Sherwood.

★monism (mon′izm), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + -ism.] 1. Any system of thought which seeks to deduce all the varied phenomena of both the physical and spiritual worlds from a single principle; specifically, the metaphysical doctrine that there is but one substance, either mind (idealism) or matter (materialism), or a substance that is neither mind nor matter, but is the substantial ground of both: opposed to dualism. The term was applied by Wolf, its inventor, to the forms of the doctrine which were then known, namely, to the denial of the substantiality either of mind or of matter; but it is now extended to the doctrine that the distinction between physical and mental facts is only phenomenal, and that in themselves they are not distinguished. Many special modifications of monistic speculation, especially on its materialistic side, have accompanied the recent developments of physical science, particularly the doctrine of evolution. (See quotation from Haeckel under monistic.) Such doctrines as that energy, electricity, etc., are categories of substance different from matter are not taken account of by those who use the term, so that it is not easy to say whether they would be considered as denials of monism or not. Also called unitism and unitarianism.

Monism led a miserable existence in philosophical dictionaries, until, as a denotation of the Hegelian philosophy, it obtained a very wide use. It had again in some measure fallen out of use when it was taken up by modern natural philosophy, and made the watchword of a doctrine which considers mind and matter neither as separated nor as derived from each other, but as standing in an essential and inseparable connection.
M. S. Phelps, tr. of Eucken's Fundamental Concepts, p. 114.

If the essence of the materialist hypothesis be to start with matter on its lowest terms, and work it thence up into its highest, I did it no wrong in taking "homogeneous extended solids" as its specified datum and its only one; so that it constituted a system of monism.
J. Martineau, Materialism (1874), p. 108.

2. Any theory or system which attempts to explain many heterogeneous phenomena by a single principle.

The solution offered by Psychophysical Monism, that functional brain-motion and feeling are two aspects of one and the same fact in nature—this solution, when closely examined, turns out to be an altogether dualistic and unthinkable assertion. E. Montgomery, Mind, IX. 366.

3. In biol., same as monogenesis (c).—Hylozoistic monism. Same as hylozoism.—Idealistic monism, the monism which regards the single principle of the universe as mind or spirit, of which matter is the product.—Materialistic monism, the monism which regards the single principle as matter, of which mind or spirit is the product.

monist (mon′ist), n. and a. [< mon(ism) + -ist.]
I. n. An adherent of the metaphysical doctrine of monism in some one of its forms.

The philosophical unitarians or monists reject the testimony of consciousness to the ultimate duality of the subject and object in perception, but they arrive at the unity of these in different ways. Some admit the testimony of consciousness to the equipoise of the mental and material phenomena, and do not attempt to reduce either mind to matter, or matter to mind. They reject, however, the evidence of consciousness to their antithesis in existence, and maintain that mind and matter are only phenomenal modifications of the same common substance. This is the doctrine of absolute identity—a doctrine of which the most illustrious representatives among recent philosophers are Schelling, Hegel, and Cousin. Others again deny the evidence of consciousness to the equipoise of subject and object as coördinate and original elements; and, as the balance is inclined in favor of the one relative or the other, two opposite schemes of psychology are determined. If the subject be taken as the original and genetic, and the object be evolved from it as its product, the theory of idealism is established. On the other hand, if the object be assumed as the original and genetic, and the subject be evolved from it as its product, the theory of materialism is established. Sir W. Hamilton, Metaph., xvi.

II. a. Same as monistic.

monistic (mō-nis′tik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + -ist-ic.] Of or pertaining to monism; of the nature of monism. See monism and monist.

Idealism is monistic in its whole conception of the universe. It claims to be a "one-substance" theory, although it should in consistency call itself a "no-substance" theory instead. Bibliotheca Sacra, XLV. 103.

The opponents of the doctrine of evolution are very fond of branding the monistic philosophy grounded upon it as "materialism," by confusing philosophical materialism with the wholly different and censurable moral materialism. Strictly, however, our monism might, as accurately or as inaccurately, be called spiritualism as materialism. The real materialistic philosophy asserts that the vital phenomena of motion, like all other phenomena of motion, are effects or products of matter. The other, opposite extreme, spiritualistic philosophy, asserts, on the contrary, that matter is the product of motive force, and that all material forms are produced by free forces entirely independent of the matter itself. Thus, according to the materialistic conception of the universe, matter or substance precedes motion or active force. According to the spiritualistic conception of the universe, on the contrary, active force precedes matter. Both views are dualistic, and we hold both of them to be equally false. A contrast to both views is presented in the monistic philosophy, which can as little believe in force without matter as in matter without force. Haeckel, Evol. of Man (trans.), II. 456.

monistical (mō-nis′ti-kal), a. Same as monistic.

monite (mō′nīt), n. [< Mona (see def.) + *-ite*2.] A hydrous calcium phosphate occurring in loosely coherent massive forms of a snow-white color, found with monitite in the guano-formation of the islands of Mona and Monita, West Indies.

monition (mō-nish′on), n. [< ME. monicion, < OF. Cf. monastery and minster, from the same source.] 1. Originally, a man who retired from the world for religious meditation and the practice of religious duties in solitude; a religious hermit; in later use, a member of a community or fraternity of men formed for the practice of religious devotions and duties, and bound by the vows of poverty, celibacy, and obedience to a superior; specifically, a regular male denizen of a monastery. Communities of more or less monastic character in Palestine and Egypt before the diffusion of Christianity were the Essenes and Therapeutæ (which see). The ordinary Christian life of the first three centuries, even when not celibate, was largely ascetic and in communities. Christian monasticism in a definite form originated in Upper Egypt in the third or fourth century (perhaps with St. Anthony; according to other accounts it is traced to the ascetic Paul, about A. D. 250). The first monks were anchorites, living in solitude. The collection of anchorites in a monastery (laura or cœnobium) is ascribed to Pachomius, in the fourth century. The institution spread rapidly, and was greatly helped in the West by the establishment of the Benedictine order in the sixth century. Various developments of the monastic system are to be found in the middle ages, as the military orders, friars (often distinguished from monks proper), etc. Since the Reformation, and especially since the French revolution, monachism has declined in Western countries, or has been overshadowed by the society of Jesuits, but still continues to flourish in Eastern churches.

Rom. of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), l. 3211.

A monk, whan he is recchelès,
Is likned to a fissch that is waterlès;
This is to seyn, a monk out of his cloystre.
Chaucer, Gen. Prol. to C. T., l. 179.

The civil death commenced, if any man was banished or abjured the realm by the process of the common law, or entered into religion; that is, went into a monastery, and became there a monk professed: in which cases he was absolutely dead in law, and his next heir should have his estate. Blackstone, Com., I. 1.

I envy them, those monks of old,
Their books they read, and their beads they told.
G. P. R. James, The Monks of Old.

2. A name of various animals. (a) The bullfinch, Pyrrhula vulgaris. (b) A variety of domestic pigeon with a white crest. (c) A monk-bird, monk-seal, monk-fish, etc.: see the compounds. (d) Any noctuid moth of the subfamily Cucullinæ: so called in Great Britain from the erect collar, like a monk's hood or cowl.

3. In printing, an over-inked spot or blotch in print, usually made by imperfect distribution of ink. Compare friar, 2.—4. Milit., a fuse for firing mines.

The most common methods of firing mines are by the use of the monk and the box-trap. . . . The monk is a bit of agaric 1½ inches in length. Farrow, Mil. Encyc., II. 376.

Black monk, a black-robed monk.

Also in the Abbey of Seynt Justine virgyne, a place of blake monkys, ryght delectable and also solytary.
Torkington, Diarie of Eng. Travell, p. 9.

Cloister monk, a monk who lives within a monastery.—Extern monk, a monk who lives outside a monastery, but serves the church connected with it.—Grazing monks, the Boskoi.

Companies like the βοσκοί, or "grazing monks," of Mesopotamia and Palestine, who roved about, shelterless and nearly naked, as Sozomen and Evagrius tell us, in the mountains and deserts, grovelling on the earth, and browsing like cattle on the herbs they casually found.
Encyc. Brit., XVI. 701.

Monk professed. See profess.—Syn. 1. Hermit, etc. See anchoret.

monk-bat (mungk′bat), n. A molossoid bat of Jamaica, Molossus nasutus or fumarius, the smoky mastiff-bat: so called because the males are often found in great numbers together. P. H. Gosse.

monk-bird (mungk′bėrd), n. The leatherhead or friar-bird. See leatherhead, 2, and cut under friar-bird.

monkery (mung′kėr-i), n.; pl. monkeries (-iz). [Early mod. E. monkrye; < monk + -ery.] 1. Monasticism, or the practices of monks: generally opprobrious.

It toucheth not monkery, nor maketh any thing at all for any such matter. Latimer, Sermon of the Plough.

Monkery and the neglect of rational agriculture conspired to turn garden-lands into deserts and freemen into serfs. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXIX. 228.

2. A monastery, or the inhabitants of a monastery.

Anon after ther arose oute of it a certain of monkery, not in apparel, but in appearance of a more sober life.
Bp. Bale, English Votaries, i.

Coeval with the conquest, it [the Benedictine St. Mary's] was one of the richest and strongest monkeries in the realm.
Harper's Mag., LXXIX. 836.

3. The country or rural districts; also, in a collective sense, tramps or vagrants. [Slang.]

I don't know what this 'ere monkry will come to, after a bit. Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, I. 266.

monkey (mung′ki), n. [Formerly also monkie, munkie, munkye (not found in ME., where only ape, the general Teut. word, appears): origin unknown; poss., with double dim., -k-ey, -k-ie (as also later in donkey), < OF. monne = Sp. Pg. mona, < It. monna, OIt. mona, a female ape, a monkey (whence OIt. dim. monicchio (a form supposed by some, erroneously, to be the immediate source of the E. word; the term. -icchio, < L. -iculus; also OF. monnine, monine, a monkey: see also mona, mono), poss. a particular use (as if 'old woman'), in allusion to the resemblance of a monkey's face to the weazen face of an old crone, of monna, a woman, in familiar use (like E. dame), 'goody'), a colloq. contraction of madonna, lady, mistress, lit. 'my lady,' 'madam.' An ultimate connection with the Gr. μμώ, an ape, has been suggested.] 1. A quadrumanous mammal of the order Primates and suborder Anthropoidea; a catarrhine or platyrrhine simian; any one of the Primates except man and the lemurs; an ape, baboon, marmoset, etc. The term is very vague, and has no technical or fixed restriction. Those monkeys which have very short tails and faces are commonly called apes, most of them belonging to the higher family Simiidæ. The monkeys with long faces like dogs are usually termed baboons; they are at the bottom of the series of Old World simians, in the family Cynopithecidæ. The small bushy-tailed monkeys of America are usually known as marmosets. Excluding these, the name monkey applies mainly to long-tailed simians of either hemisphere. All the Old World monkeys, in any sense of the word, are catarrhine, and have 32 teeth, as in man. They constitute two families, Simiidæ and Cynopithecidæ. (See cuts under Cercopithecus, Catarrhina, and Diana, 2.) All the New World monkeys are platyrrhine: there are two families, Cebidæ, with 36 teeth and mostly prehensile tails, and Midiidæ or marmosets, with 32 teeth and bushy non-prehensile tails. (See cuts under Cebinæ, Eriodes, and Lagothrix.) The genera of monkeys are about 35 in number, including several that are fossil. The species are particularly numerous in Africa and South America, especially in the tropical parts. There are many, however, in the warmer parts of Asia, and even up to the snow-line; a single one is found in Europe, the Barbary ape, Inuus ecaudatus. (See cut at ape.) Almost all the leading species have specific names in the vernacular as well as their technical scientific designations.

Guenon, or Common Green Monkey (Cercopithecus sabæus).

The strain of man 's bred out Into baboon and monkey.
Shak., T. of A., i. 1. 260.

2. An epithet applied to any one, especially to a boy or girl, in either real or pretended disapproval: sometimes expressing endearment.

Now God help thee, poor monkey! But how wilt thou do for a father? Shak., Macbeth, iv. 1. 59.

Help your companions, but don't talk religious sentiment to them; and serve the poor, but, for your lives, you little monkeys, don't preach to them.
Ruskin, Letter to Young Girls.

3. A pile-driving instrument with two handles, raised by pulleys, and guided in its descent so as to cause it to fall on the head of a pile and drive it into the ground; a fistuca; a beetle-head.—4. A sort of power-hammer used in ship-building for driving bolts, composed of a long pig of iron traversing in a groove, which is raised by pulleys, and let fall on the spot required.—5. A small crucible used in glass-making.—6. A certain sum of money: in the United States, $500; in Great Britain, £500: used especially in betting. [Slang.]

A monkey at least to the credit side of your own book landed in about a minute and a half.
Whyte Melville, Good for Nothing.

The Grand Hurdle Handicap, the added money to which is a monkey. Daily Chronicle, Feb. 3, 1885. (Encyc. Dict.)

7†. A kind of bustle formerly worn by women. See the quotation.

The monkey was a small "bustle," which in the days of very short waists was worn just below the shoulder blades.
N. and Q., 7th ser., VII. 498.

8. Same as water-monkey.

In the front room a monkey and two tumblers stood on the center table.
Olive Schreiner, Story of an African Farm, ii. 8.

9. A fluid composed of two parts of chlorhydric acid (generally called spirits of salt by workmen) and one part of zinc, used in soldering. It is applied to the joints to be soldered, and acts both to prevent oxidation when heat is applied and to dissolve any oxid which may have already formed, and which would otherwise prevent the adherence of the solder.—Gibraltar monkey. Same as Barbary ape (which see, under ape).—Leonine monkey, masked monkey, etc. See the adjectives.—Monkey's allowance. See the quotation. [Humorous.]

You fellows worked like bricks, spent money, and got midshipman's half-pay (nothing a day, and find yourself) and monkey's allowance (more kicks than half-pence).
Kingsley, Letter, May, 1856. (Davies.)

Monkey's dinner-bell. See Hura.—Mustache monkey, negro monkey, etc. See the qualifying words.—Silky monkey. Same as marikina.—To have or get one's monkey up, to have one's temper roused; get angry. [Slang.]—To suck the monkey. (a) To suck wine or spirits from a cask through an inserted tube or straw. (b) To drink rum or other liquor. [Nautical slang.]

Jack will suck the monkey, in whatever form or wherever he presents himself.
Macy.

"Do you know what sucking the monkey means?" "No, sir." "Well then, I'll tell you; it is a term used among seamen for drinking rum out of cocoanuts, the milk having been poured out and the liquor substituted."
Marryat, Peter Simple, xxx.

monkey (mung'ki), v. [< monkey, n.] I. intrans. To act in an idle or meddlesome manner; trifle; fool: as, don't monkey with that gun. [Colloq.]

I hope he'll fetch money. I've had enough o' monkeying 'long o' checks.
Harper's Mag., LXXIX. 465.

II. trans. To imitate as a monkey does; ape. [Rare.]

All cursed the doer for an evil
Called here enlarging on the Devil,
There monkeying the Lord.
Mrs. Browning, Tale of Villafranca, st. 8.

monk-seam (mungk'sēm), n. Same as monk's-seam.

monk's-gun (mungks'gun), n. The wheel-lock gun of the beginning of the sixteenth century: so called from the legend that it had been invented by the monk Schwarz, the supposed discoverer of gunpowder.

monk's-harquebus (mungks'här″kwe-bus), n. Same as monk's-gun.

monk's-hood (mungks'hůd), n. A plant of the genus Aconitum, especially A. Napellus. Also called friar's-cap, foxbane, helmet-flower, Jacob's-chariot, and wolf's-bane. See Aconitum and aconite.

monk's-rhubarb (mungks'rö″bärb), n. A European species of dock, Rumex Patientia. See *dock*¹.

monk's-seam (mungks'sēm), n. 1. Naut., a seam formed by stitching through the center of a joining made by laying the selvages of two cloths of canvas one over the other and stitching them on both sides. Also called middle stitching.—2. The mark left on a bullet by the mold at the junction of its two halves. [Eng.] Also monk-seam.

monmouth (mon'muth), n. A flat cap originally made at Monmouth, England, formerly much worn by seamen.

Caps which the Dutch seamen buy, called monmouth caps. Defoe, Tour through Great Britain, II. 339. (Davies.)

Monmouth cock. A fashion of wearing the flap-hat imitated from the Duke of Monmouth, son of Charles II., and still prevailing in the early part of the eighteenth century.

The smartest of the country Squires appear still in the Monmouth Cock, and when they go a wooing, whether they have any post in the militia or not, they generally put on a red coat. Spectator, No. 129.

Monmouth hat. A hat worn with a Monmouth cock.

monnet† (mon'et), n. See the quotation.

Little ears denote a good understanding, but they must not be of those ears which, being little, are withall deformed, which happens to men as well as cattel, which for this reason they call monnets; for such ears signifie nothing but mischief and malice.
Saunders, Physiognomie (1653). (Nares.) mono (mō'nō), n. [Sp. mono, m., a monkey; cf. mona.] The black howler or howling monkey, Mycetes villosus.

mono-. [L., etc., mono-, < Gr. μονο-, stem of μόνος, single, only: see monad.] A prefix in many words of Greek origin or formation, meaning 'single,' 'one.'

monoaxal (mon-ō-ak'sạl), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + L. axis, axis: see axal.] Pertaining to a single axis.—Monoaxal isotropy, the case in which the homotatic coefficients are completely isotropic round one axis only.

monobasic (mon-ō-bā'sik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + βάσις, base.] In chemistry, noting an acid which contains but one atom of hydrogen replaceable by a univalent element or radical to form a neutral salt.

monoblastic (mon-ō-blas'tik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + βλαστός, germ.] Relating to that condition of the metazoic ovum or embryo which immediately succeeds segmentation, in which a single germinal layer is alone represented: correlated with diploblastic and triploblastic.

Monoblepharideæ (mon-ō-blef-a-rid'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Monoblepharis (-id-) + -eæ.] A family of phycomycetous fungi, closely related to the Peronosporaceæ. The thallus-hyphæ bear terminal oögones, in which the whole protoplasm contracts and forms the oösphere. Asexual reproduction takes place by the formation of uniciliated zoöspores in zoösporangia, as in the well-known genus Phytophthora.

Monoblepharis (mon-ō-blef'a-ris), n. [NL. (Cornu), < Gr. μόνος, single, + βλέφαρον, eyelid.] A genus of fungi, typical of the family Monoblepharideæ.

monoblepsis (mon-ō-blep'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + βλέψις, sight, < βλέπειν, see, look on.] In pathol., a condition of vision in which it is more distinct when one eye only is used.

monobrachius (mon-ō-brā′ki-us), n.; pl. monobrachii (-i). [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + L. brachium, the arm.] In teratol., a monster having a single arm.

monobromated (mon-ō-brō′mā-ted), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + E. brom(ine) + -ate[1] + -ed[2].] Containing one bromine atom: used only of organic compounds in which one atom of bromine has been introduced into each molecule by substitution or addition.—Monobromated camphor. See camphora monobromata, under camphor.

monobromized (mon-ō-brō′mīzd), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + brom(ine) + -ize + -ed[2].] Same as monobromated. Nature, XL. 539.

monocarbonate (mon-ō-kär′bō-nāt), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + E. carbonate.] A carbonate in which both hydrogen atoms of the acid are replaced by basic elements or radicals: distinguished from bicarbonates, in which only one hydrogen atom is so replaced. More appropriately called normal carbonate.

monocarp (mon′ō-kärp), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + καρπός, fruit.] In bot., a plant that perishes after having once borne fruit; an annual plant.

monocarpellary (mon-ō-kär′pe-lā-ri), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + E. carpel + -ary[1].] Composed of one carpel. Compare polycarpellary.

monocarpic (mon-ō-kär′pik), a. [< monocarp + -ic.] Same as monocarpous (a).

monocarpous (mon-ō-kär′pus), a. [< monocarp + -ous.] In bot.: (a) Producing fruit but once in its life: said of annual plants. (b) Noting a flower in which the gynœcium forms only a single ovary, whether simple or compound.

Monocaulidæ (mon-ō-kâ′li-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Monocaulis + -idæ.] A family of tubularian hydroids or gymnoblastic Hydroida, typified by the genus Monocaulis, having a simple hydrosoma with a single fixed hydranth.

Monocaulis, Monocaulus (mon-ō-kâ′lis, -lus), n. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + καυλός, a stalk, stem: see caulis.] The typical genus of Monocaulidæ. M. pendula is a simple tubular hydromedusa with a single hydranth pendulous upon the nodding or cernuous stem, and bearing two circlets of tentacles. It is of very soft, delicate structure and pink color, attaining a length of 4 inches. Also Monocaulos.

monocellular (mon-ō-sel′ū-lăr), a. [< monocellule + -ar[3].] Same as unicellular. Nature, XLI. 148.

monocellule (mon-ō-sel′ūl), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + E. cellule.] A unicellular organism; an animal or a plant which consists of a single cell.

monocentric (mon-ō-sen′trik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + κέντρον, center: see centric.] 1. Having or proceeding from a single center.—2. In anat., unipolar: applied to a rete mirabile which is not gathered again into a single trunk: opposed to amphicentric.

Monocentridæ (mon-ō-sen′tri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Monocentris + -idæ.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes, typified by the genus Monocentris. They have the body covered with large angular bone-like scales, a spinous dorsal fin separate from the soft dorsal and composed of 5 large spines divaricated and not completely connected by membrane, and the ventrals represented only by very large spines. The pine-cone fish is Monocentris japonicus of Japanese seas. M. gloriæ-maris is the knight-fish of Australia.

Monocentris (mon-ō-sen′tris), n. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + κέντρον, point, center: see center[1].] The typical genus of Monocentridæ, characterized by the great development of the ventral spines. Bloch and Schneider, 1801. Also Monocentrus.

monocephalous (mon-ō-sef′a-lus), a. [< NL. monocephalus, < Gr. μονοκέφαλος, one-headed, < μόνος, single, + κεφαλή, head.] 1. Having only one head; in bot., bearing a single capitulum or head.—2. Specifically, having the character of a monocephalus.

monocephalus (mon-ō-sef′a-lus), n.; pl. monocephali (-lī). [NL.: see monocephalous.] In teratol., a double monster having only one head but two bodies. Also called syncephalus.

monocercous (mon-ō-sėr′kus), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + κέρκος, the tail of a beast: see cercus.] Having only one "tail," or flagellum; uniflagellate, as an infusorian.

monoceros (mō-nos′e-ros), n. [< L. monoceros, < Gr. μονόκερως, a unicorn, < μονόκερως, also μονοκέρατος, one-horned, < μόνος, single, + κέρας, horn.] 1. A unicorn, or some other one-horned animal, real or imaginary.

> Mighty Monoceroses with immeasured tayles.
> • Spenser, F. Q., II. xii. 23.

2. [cap.] A constellation, the Unicorn, south of the Twins and the Crab, and between the two Dogs, introduced by Jacob Bartsch in 1624.—3. The narwhal, Monodon monoceros.—4. [cap.] In zoöl.: (a) A genus of prosobranchiates of the family Muricidæ, so called from the large spine on the outer lip; the unicorn-shells. There are several species from the west coast of America. Lamarck, 1809. (b) A genus of balistoid fishes. Bloch and Schneider, 1801.

Monoceros imbricatum.

monocerous (mō-nos′e-rus), a. [< Gr. μονόκερως, one-horned: see monoceros.] Having one horn or horn-like part; unicorn.

monochasial (mon-ō-kā′si-al), a. [< monochasium + -al.] In bot., pertaining to or resembling a monochasium.

monochasium (mon-ō-kā′si-um), n.; pl. monochasia (-ä). [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + χάσις, separation, chasm, < χαίνειν, gape: see chasm.] In bot., a cyme with one main axis; a uniparous cyme: a term proposed by Eichler.

Monochitonida (mon″ō-kī-ton′i-dä), n. pl. [NL. (cf. Gr. μονοχίτων, wearing only a tunic), < Gr. μόνος, single, + χιτών, a tunic (see chiton), + -ida.] A division of tunicaries or Tunicata, containing those which have the inner and outer integuments united in a single tunic, such as the Salpidæ and Doliolidæ: opposed to Dichitonida. Fleming, 1828.

monochitonidan (mon″ō-kī-ton′i-dan), a. and n. I. a. Having a single tunic; specifically, pertaining to the Monochitonida, or having their characters.

II. n. A member of the Monochitonida, as a salp or doliolid.

Monochlamydeæ (mon″ō-kla-mid′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1819), fem. pl. of monochlamydeus: see monochlamydeous.] A series of dicotyledonous plants. They are characterized by flowers with a perianth of a single whorl, and are so distinguished from the divisions Choripetalæ and Sympetalæ, which have two whorls, or both calyx and corolla. The term is properly restricted to plants possessing a calyx, and should therefore exclude those destitute of floral envelops (Achlamydeæ), which are also classed as apetalous. The series is no longer considered a natural group.

monochlamydeous (mon″ō-kla-mid′ē-us), a. [< NL. monochlamydeus, < Gr. μόνος, single, + χλαμύς (χλαμυδ-), a cloak: see chlamys.] In bot., having a single instead of a double perianth: applied to flowers. The missing set is considered to be the inner, or corolla. Compare achlamydeous and dichlamydeous. See Monochlamydeæ.

a. Monochlamydeous Flower—Daphne Mezereum. b. Perianth cut open, showing the single envelop.

monochord (mon′ō-kôrd), n. [= F. monocorde = Sp. Pg. monocordio = It. monocordo, < LL. monochordos, monochordon, < Gr. μονόχορδον, a monochord, neut. of μονόχορδος, with a single string, < μόνος, single, + χορδή, string.] An acoustical instrument, invented at a very early date in Egypt or Greece, consisting of a long resonance-box over which a single string of gut or wire is stretched, the vibrating length, and thus the pitch, of which is fixed by a movable bridge. The position of the bridge required to produce particular intervals may be mathematically determined, and marked on the body of the instrument. The monochord has been much used in acoustical demonstration and in teaching pure intonation. In the middle ages smaller instruments with several strings were made, and were often permanently tuned to give certain intervals. (See helicon (a).) The notion of a primitive keyboard-instrument doubtless sprang from some such beginning.

monochroic (mon-ō-krō′ik), a. [< Gr. μονόχροος, of one color, < μόνος, single, + χρόα, color.] Having but one color; monochromatic.

monochromatic (mon″ō-krō-mat′ik), a. [= F. monochromatique = Pg. monochromatico, < Gr. μονοχρώματος, of one color, < μόνος, single, + χρῶμα(τ-), color: see chromatic.] Consisting of light of one wave-length, and in that sense of one color only, as the light produced by a Bunsen flame in which sodium is being volatilized. The light of the flame is almost entirely that due to the two sodium lines, the colors of which are barely distinguishable from one another, and the consequence is that objects viewed by this light are all yellow, and differ only in form and illumination. A monochromatic light gives a single bright line when viewed with the spectroscope.

monochrome (mon′ō-krōm), n. [= F. monochrome = Pg. monochroma, < ML. monochroma, fem. of L. monochromos, < Gr. μονόχρωμος, also μονοχρώματος, of one color (see monochromatic), < μόνος, single, + χρῶμα, color.] Painting or a painting in one color, which may, however, be relieved by the use of lighter and darker shades. Compare camaïeu and grisaille.

monochromical (mon-ō-krō′mi-kal), a. [As monochrom(at)ic + -al.] Of a single color; one-colored.

monochromy (mon′ō-krō-mi), n. [As monochrome + -y[3].] The art or practice of painting in monochrome, or in one or more shades of a single color.

> Monochromy is advantageously employed when it is desired, on the one hand, to avoid the brilliancy attendant on the introduction of several distinct colours, and, on the other, the dullness consequent on the exclusive use of a single tone. O. N. Rood, Modern Chromatics, p. 310.

monochronic (mon-ō-kron′ik), a. [< LL. monochronos, of the same time or measure, < Gr. μονόχρονος, of the same time or measure, consisting of one time or measure, temporary, < μόνος, single, + χρόνος, time.] Of one and the same time; existing or happening at the same time; contemporaneous; in geol., deposited, or apparently deposited, at the same period: said of organic remains.

monochronous (mō-nok′rō-nus), a. [< Gr. μονόχρονος, of the same time or measure: see monochronic.] In anc. pros., consisting in or equal to one time or mora; monosemic.

monociliated (mon-ō-sil′i-ā-ted), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + NL. cilium + -ate[1] + -ed[2].] Having one cilium or flagellum; uniciliate or uniflagellate.

monocle (mon′ō-kl), n. [= OF. monocle, one-eyed, F. monocle, a single eye-glass, < LL. monoculus, one-eyed: see monoculous.] 1. A monoculous or one-eyed animal; a monocule.—2. A glass for one eye; a single eye-glass.

> Another [man], with a monocle in his eye, watched each new comer, his vacant and necessarily glassy stare expressing neither present pleasure nor anticipation.
> The Century, XXXIII. 208.

Monoclea (mon-ō-klē′ä), n. [NL. (W. J. Hooker, 1820), so called because the sporangia open only on one side; < Gr. μόνος, single, + κλείς, a key.] A genus of anacrogynous Jungermanniaceæ of the tribe Leptotheceæ, containing two species, natives of New Zealand and tropical America. They are small plants with frondose thallus.

Monocleaceæ (mon″ō-klē-ā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Nees von Esenbeck, 1833–8), < Monoclea + -aceæ.] A former family of cryptogamous plants of the class Hepaticæ, now referred to the Jungermanniaceæ. The vegetative structure is either thalloid or foliose; the sporangium dehisces longitudinally, and contains elaters, but has no columella. The family contained the genera Monoclea and Calobryum, now placed in different tribes.

monoclinal (mon′ō-klī-nal), a. and n. [< monocline + -al.] I. a. In geol., dipping in one direction: said of a zone of stratified rocks throughout which the strata all incline toward the same point of the compass. The term was introduced by H. D. Rogers (1842), and has taken the place of Darwin's hybrid word uniclinal: thus, monoclinal valley (a valley bounded by ridges the strata of which all dip in the same direction); monoclinal ridge; monoclinal flexure, etc. A monoclinal flexure is a belt of inclined strata between adjacent bodies of horizontal strata, such as occurs in the plateaus of Utah and Arizona.

> The Echo-Cliff flexure, the Water-Pocket flexure, one of the grandest monoclinals of the west, and the San Rafael flexure, all monoclinal flexures of imposing dimensions and perfect form, Capt. Dutton considers go far back in Tertiary time, and possibly are pre-Tertiary.
> Reade, Origin of Mountain Ranges, p. 250.

II. n. A monoclinal fold or flexure. See definition I.

monoclinate (mon′ō-klī-nāt), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + κλίνειν, incline, + -ate[1].] Same as monoclinic.

monocline (mon′ō-klīn), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + κλίνειν, incline: see cline.] Same as monoclinal.

monoclinic (mon-ō-klin′ik), a. [= F. monoclinique; < Gr. μόνος, single, + κλίνειν, incline.] In mineral., an epithet noting that system of crystallization in which the crystals are referred to three unequal axes, two of which intersect each other at an oblique angle, while they are at right angles to the third. See crystallography. Also monosymmetric, clinorhombic, hemiorthotype, monoclinometric, and monoclinohedric.

monoclinohedric (mon-ō-klī-nō-hed′rik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + κλίνειν, incline, + ἕδρα, seat, base.] Same as monoclinic.

monoclinometric (mon-ō-klī-nō-met′rik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + κλίνειν, incline, + μέτρον, measure.] Same as monoclinic: as, "monoclinometric prisms," Frey.

monoclinous (mon′ō-klī-nus), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + κλίνη, bed, < κλίνειν, incline: see clinic.] 1. In bot., hermaphrodite, or having both stamens and pistils in the same flower. —2. In geol., monoclinal.

Monocœlia (mon-ō-sē′li-ạ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + κοιλία, a cavity, hollow: see cœlia.] Animals whose encephalocœle is single, neuron epaxial only, and axon unsegmented. The lancelet (Branchiostoma) is the only example. Synonymous with Acrania, Cephalochorda, Leptocardii, and Monolocularia. Wilder, Amer. Nat., Oct., 1887, p. 914.

monocœlian (mon-ō-sē′li-ạn), a. [< Monocœlia + -an.] Having the encephalocœle single; specifically, of or pertaining to the Monocœlia.

mono-compound (mon′ō-kom″pound), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + E. compound[1].] In chem., a compound containing one atom of the element or one individual of the radical specified, as monochloracetic acid, which contains one atom of chlorin, and monophenylamine, which contains one atomic group of phenyl.

Monocondyla (mon-ō-kon′di-lạ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + κόνδυλος, a knuckle, joint, knob: see condyle.] The Reptilia and Aves (reptiles and birds) collectively: so called from the single occipital condyle characteristic of these classes among the higher vertebrates: a group exactly conterminous with Sauropsida. Commonly Monocondylia.

monocondylar (mon-ō-kon′di-lạr), a. Same as monocondylian.

monocondylian (mon″ō-kon-dil′i-ạn), a. [As Monocondyla + -ian.] Having one occipital condyle, as the skull of birds, reptiles, and some fishes: distinguished from dicondylian.

monocotyledon (mon-ō-kot-i-lē′dọn), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + κοτυληδών, a hollow, a sucker, etc.: see cotyledon.] A monocotyledonous plant. See cut under cotyledon.

Monocotyledones (mon-ō-kot-i-lē′dọn-ēz), n. pl. [NL. (Ray, 1703), < Gr. μόνος, single, + κοτυληδών, a cup-shaped cavity: see cotyledon.] A subclass of angiospermous plants coördinate with the Dicotyledones (which see), characterized chiefly by having a single seed-leaf or cotyledon in the embryo. They have generally the parts of their flowers in threes (not in fives, as in dicotyledons), their earliest leaves alternate, and the veins parallel. From the structure of the stem, increasing by internal or endogenous growth, they have sometimes been called endogens. The wood of their stems occurs in longitudinal bundles of fibers, scattered, as in Indian corn, or becoming compact, as in palms. New bundles of fibers form between the old, not, as in dicotyledons or exogens, in an annual external layer enveloping the stem. The class is divided into 11 orders and 42 families, among which are the lily, iris, amaryllis, orchis, banana, palm, pineapple, screwpine, arum, rush, sedge, and grass families. Larger subdivisions are made by some authors, but there is lack of harmony with regard to their limits. The Monocotyledones constitute about 20 per cent. of all the species of flowering plants.

Monocotyledonous Embryo.
1. Grain of wheat (Triticum æstivum), longitudinal section, showing the embryo and the endosperm (End). 2. Germinating plantlet of Indian corn (the test of the seed and the endosperm removed to show the cotyledon): Cot, cotyledon; R, the primary root; r, a secondary root.

monocotyledonous (mon-ō-kot-i-lē′dọn-us), a. [< monocotyledon + -ous.] Having only one seed-lobe or seminal leaf.

monocracy (mō-nok′rā-si), n.; pl. monocracies (-siz). [< LGr. μονοκρατία, sole dominion, < Gr. μόνος, single, + κρατεῖν, rule, < κράτος, strength.] Government or rule by a single person; autocracy.

A scene of wholesale bacchanalian fraud, a posse comitatus of liars, which would disgust any man with a free government, and make him sigh for the monocracy of Constantinople. Sydney Smith, Ballot. (Latham.) monocrat (mon′ō-krat), n. [Cf. MGr. μονοκράτωρ, a sole ruler; < Gr. μόνος, single, + κρατεῖν, rule, < κράτος, strength.] 1. One who governs alone; an autocrat.—2. In U. S. hist., a name often applied by opponents to a member of the Federalist party, to which monarchical tendencies were imputed.

monocular (mo-nok′ū-lạr), a. [= F. monoculaire, < LL. monoculus, one-eyed: see monoculous.] 1. Having only one eye. Also monoculate.—2. Of or referring to one eye or vision with one eye; suited or intended for the use of one eye only.—Monocular microscope. See microscope.

monocularly (mo-nok′ū-lạr-li), adv. By means of one eye; so as to be seen by one eye only.

No one who has only thus worked monocularly can appreciate the guidance derivable from binocular vision.
W. B. Carpenter, Mic.os., § 36.

monoculate (mo-nok′ū-lāt), a. [As monocul(ar) + -ate[1].] Same as monocular, 1.

monocule (mon′ō-kūl), n. [< NL. Monoculus.] A member of the genus Monoculus.

monoculite (mo-nok′ū-līt), n. [< LL. monoculus, one-eyed (see monoculous), + -ite[2].] A fossil animal that appears to have but one eye.

monoculous (mo-nok′ū-lus), a. [= OF. moncle, monocule = Sp. monóculo = It. monocolo, < LL. monoculus, one-eyed, < Gr. μόνος, single, + L. oculus, eye: see oculus. Cf. monocle.] One-eyed; monocular.

Dr. Knox was the monoculous Waterloo surgeon, with whom I remember breakfasting.
O. W. Holmes, The Atlantic, LIX. 638.

Monoculus (mo-nok′ū-lus), n. [NL., < LL. monoculus, one-eyed: see monoculous.] 1. An old and disused genus of the Linnean class Insecta and order Aptera, having or seeming to have only one eye — that is, two eyes coalesced in one. These "apterous insects" were entomostracous crustaceans. Monoculus and some other entomostracans were afterward made by Latreille his first order of Entomostraca, called Branchiopoda and divided into two principal sections, Lophyropoda and Phyllopoda.

2. [l. c.] A one-eyed animal; a monocule or monocle.—3. [l. c.] A bandage for one eye.

★monocyclo (mon′ō-sī-kl), n. [< Gr. μονόκυκλος, having but one wheel or circle, < μόνος, single, + κύκλος, a circle, a wheel: see cycle[1].] A vehicle with one wheel: used figuratively in the quotation. [Rare.]

Nay, a not unfrequent "penance" consists in tying the hands to the ankles, and turning round and round like a cart-wheel. Near Goruckpoor the train of Lord Dalhousie met dozens of these animated monocycles.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXII. 263.

Monocyclia (mon-ō-sik′li-ạ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + κύκλος, a circle: see cycle[1].] A division of holothurians containing those in which the tentacles are in one circle or series: correlated with Heterocyclia.

★monocyclic (mon-ō-sik′lik), a. [< Gr. μονόκυκλος, having but one circle: see monocycle and -ic.] 1. Disposed in a single whorl or circular series, as the stamens in many flowers.—2. Of or pertaining to the Monocyclia.

monocyst (mon′ō-sist), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + κύστις, a bag, pouch.] A tumor consisting of only one cyst. Thomas, Med. Dict.

Monocystaceæ (mon″ō-sis-tā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + κύστις, a bladder, + -aceæ.] A family of low organisms of the order Monadineæ. They are moisture-loving, occurring on living Algæ and Protozoa.

monocysted (mon′ō-sis-ted), a. [As monocyst + -ed[2].] Having a single cyst; monocystidean.

The developmental history of the monocysted gregarines. T. Gill, Smithsonian Report, 1885.

monocystic (mon-ō-sis′tik), a. [< monocyst + -ic.] Consisting of a single cyst, as a gregarine. Encyc. Brit., XIX. 853.

Monocystidea (mon″ō-sis-tid′ē-ạ), n. pl. [NL., < Monocystis + -idea.] A division of Gregarinida, containing those gregarines whose body consists of a single sac: contrasted with Dicystidea. Also Monocystidæ, as a family.

monocystidean (mon″ō-sis-tid′ē-ạn), a. Monocysted; of or pertaining to the Monocystidea.

Monocystis (mon-ō-sis′tis), n. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + κύστις, a bag, pouch.] The typical genus of Monocystidæ. M. agilis is found in the male organ of the earthworm.

Monocyttaria (mon″ō-si-tā′ri-ạ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + κυττάριον, dim. of κύτταρος, a hollow, a cell, < κίτος, a hollow.] A division of Radiolaria, containing those radiolarians which have a single central capsule: distinguished from Polycyttaria. Most radiolarians are of this character. Also called Monozoa.

monocyttarian (mon″ō-si-tā′ri-ạn), a. and n. [As Monocyttaria + -an.] I. a. Having a single central capsule, as a radiolarian; of or pertaining to the Monocyttaria. Also monozoan.

II. n. A radiolarian whose central capsule is single.

monodactyl, monodactyle (mon-ō-dak′til), a. Same as monodactylous. Nature, XXXVIII. 623.

monodactylic (mon″ō-dak-til′ik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + δάκτυλος, a finger, a dactyl: see dactylic.] In anc. pros., containing but one dactyl: noting certain logaœdic meters. See monanapestic.

monodactylous (mon-ō-dak′ti-lus), a. [= F. monodactyle = Pg. monodactylo, < Gr. μονοδάκτυλος, one-fingered, < μόνος, single, + δάκτυλος, a finger or toe: see dactyl.] 1. Having but one finger or toe; unidigitate.—2. In Crustacea, subchelate: applied to the subcheliform limbs of crustaceans and arachnidans, in which there is no opposable finger to convert the terminal hook into a pincer-like claw or chela proper.

monodelph (mon′ō-delf), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + δελφύς, womb.] A monodelphian mammal.

Monodelphia (mon-ō-del′fi-ạ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + δελφύς, womb.] The highest of three primary divisions of mammals, or subclasses of the class Mammalia (the other two being Didelphia and Ornithodelphia); placental mammals, or Placentalia. The subclass contains all mammals except the marsupials and monotremes. The young are retained in the womb by means of placental attachment till they are well developed; the scrotum is never in front of the penis; and the uterus and vagina are never paired. The brain has a well-developed corpus callosum, and comparatively small anterior commissure. The Monodelphia are variously divided into an upper and a lower series, Educabilia or Megasthena and Ineducabilia or Microsthena; or into Archencephala (man alone), Gyrencephala, and Lissencephala; or directly into a number of orders. The orders of living monodelphians now usually adopted are eleven: Primates, Feræ, Ungulata, Hyracoidea, Proboscidea, Sirenia, and Cete, of the upper series; and Chiroptera, Insectivora, Glires (or Rodentia), and Bruta (or Edentata), of the lower series. The families are about 150 in number. Eutheria is a synonym. Also, wrongly, Monadelphia. Blainville, 1816.

monodelphian (mon-ō-del′fi-ạn), a. and n. [< Monodelphia + -an.] I. a. Having the female generative passages single; specifically, pertaining to the Monodelphia, or having their characters.

II. n. A monodelphian mammal.

monodelphic (mon-ō-del′fik), a. [< monodelph + -ic.] Same as monodelphian.

monodelphous (mon-ō-del′fus), a. Same as monodelphian.

monodia (mō-nō′di-ạ), n. Same as monody.

monodic (mō-nod′ik), a. [= It. monodico, < Gr. μονῳδικός, < μονῳδία, a monody: see monody.] In music, pertaining to monody or homophony; homophonic. Also monophonic.—Monodic school or style, that style of composition which supplanted the purely polyphonic or contrapuntal about 1600.

monodical (mō-nod′i-kạl), a. [< monodic + -al.] Same as monodic.

monodically (mō-nod′i-kạl-i), adv. In a monodic manner.

monodichlamydeous (mon-ō-dī-kla-mid′ē-us), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + δι-, two, + χλαμύς (χλαμυδ-), a cloak.] In bot., having indifferently either a calyx only, or both calyx and corolla. Lindley. [Not now in use.]

monodimetric (mon″ō-dī-met′rik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + δίς, δι-, twice, + μέτρον, measure: see dimetric.] In crystal., same as dimetric or ★tetragonal.

monodist (mon′ō-dist), n. [= Pg. monodista; as monod-y + -ist.] One who composes or sings in a monodic style, as opposed to the polyphonic style: opposed to contrapuntist.

Monodon (mon′ō-don), n. [NL., < Gr. μονόδους (μονοδοντ-), having but one tooth: see monodont.] 1. A genus of delphinoid odontocete cetaceans, containing only the narwhal, M. monoceros, distinguished by its unique dentition. With the exception of some rudimentary and irregular teeth, the whole dentition consists of a pair of teeth lying horizontally in the jaw; in the female they remain embedded and cemented in their sockets, but in the male the left one grows into an enormous tusk, like a horn projecting from the forehead, sometimes half as long as the entire animal, straight, slender, cylindrical, but spirally grooved sinistrally, and thus resembling a rope. The vertebræ are 50 in number, the ribs 11; the cervicals are normally free, and there is no dorsal fin. See cut under narwhal.

Skull and Tusk of Male Narwhal (Monodon monoceros).

2. In conch., same as Monodonta. Cuvier, 1817.

monodont (mon′ō-dont), a. [< Gr. μονόδους (μονοδοντ-), having but one tooth, < μόνος, single, + ὀδούς = E. tooth.] Having only one tooth.

Monodonta (mon-ō-don′tạ), n. [NL., < Gr. μονόδους (μονοδοντ-); having but one tooth: see monodont.] A genus of top-shells of the family Trochidæ, having a toothed columella: named by Lamarck in 1799. There are a number of species, known as rosary-shells.

Monodonta labio. Monodonta (Clanculus) pharaonis.

Monodontinæ (mon″ō-don-tī′nē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Monodon(t-) + -inæ.] The narwhals as a subfamily of Delphinidæ: now usually merged in the subfamily Delphinapterinæ.

Monodora (mon-ō-dō′rą), n. [NL. (Dunal, 1817), so called in allusion to the solitary flowers; ⟨ Gr. μόνος, single, + δῶρον, gift.] A genus of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants of the family Anonaceæ, type of the tribe Monodoreæ, distinguished by a one-celled compound ovary with numerous seeds attached over the whole surface of the walls. They are trees with large solitary variegated flowers, hanging upon a long stalk which terminates the stem or is opposite the leaves. They have three sepals, six wavy petals, many short stamens, and a shield-shaped stigma; their large globose woody fruit contains numerous seeds in a resinous central pulp. There are 7 species, natives of tropical Africa, of which M. Myristica, the calabash-nutmeg, furnishes in its seeds a nutmeg-like spice. It is cultivated in Jamaica, etc., and hence called American, Jamaica, and Mexican nutmeg. M. Angolensis yields a similar product.

monodrama (mon-ō-drä′mą), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. μόνος, single, + δρᾶμα, a drama.] A dramatic piece for a single performer or actor: sometimes used also for a piece for two performers.

monodramatic (mon″ō-dra-mat′ik), a. [⟨ monodrama + -atic[2].] Pertaining to a monodrama.

monodramet, n. [⟨ monodrama.] Same as monodrama.

monodromic (mon-ō-drom′ik), a. [⟨ Gr. μόνος, single, + δρόμος, a course, running, race.] In math., having a single sheet in the Riemann's surface; not having different values for one value of the variable. A monodromic function is one having the property that if, by a continuous change, the variable makes an excursion and returns to its original value, the function will also return to its original value. ★Also monotropic.

monody (mon′ō-di), n.; pl. monodies (-diz). [Also monodia; = F. monodie = Sp. monodia = Pg. It. monodia, ⟨ ML. monodia, ⟨ LL. monodia, monodium, ⟨ Gr. μονῳδία, a solo, lament, ⟨ μόνος, single, + ᾠδή, a song, ode: see ode.] 1. In music: (a) A style of composition in which one voice-part decidedly preponderates in interest over the others; homophony: opposed to polyphony, in which all the voice-parts are equally important. The term is specially applied to the modern style which arose somewhat before 1600 in Italy, and which led rapidly to the invention and great popularity of the opera, the oratorio, and the instrumental suite. The style itself had long before been known in popular songs and dances, but only then asserted itself as a controlling power in artistic music. (b) A piece written in monodic style; a melody, tune, or air, usually for the voice. (c) A composition written in one part only; a solo. Also monophony.

> Funerall songs were called . . . Monodia if they were vttered by one alone, and this was vsed at the enterment of Princes and others of great accompt, and it was reckoned a great ciuilitie to vse such ceremonies.
> Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 39.

2. Monotonous sound; monotonousness of sound.

> Hear the tolling of the bells —
> Iron bells!
> What a world of solemn thought their monody compels!
> Poe, The Bells, iv.

monodynamic (mon″ō-dī-nam′ik), a. [⟨ Gr. μόνος, single, + δύναμις, power: see dynamic.] Having but one power, capacity, or talent. [Rare.]

> Monodynamic men, men of a single talent, are rarely misapprehended. De Quincey.

Monœca (mō-nē′kä), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Gr. μόνος, single, + οἶκος, house.] In De Blainville's classification (1825), the second of three subclasses of his Paracephalophora, contrasted with Dioica and Hermaphrodita, named in the form Monoica.

Monœcia (mō-nē′shi-ą), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Gr. μόνος, single, + οἶκος, house.] The twenty-first class of plants in the artificial system of Linnæus. In this class the stamens and pistils are in separate flowers on the same plant, as in the Araceæ.

monœcian, monecian (mō-nē′shi-ąn), a. and n. [⟨ monœci-ous + -an.] I. a. Same as monœcious.

II. n. A monœcious animal.

monœcious, monecious (mō-nē′shus), a. [⟨ Gr. μόνος, single, + οἶκος, house.] 1. In bot.: (a) In phanerogams, having the stamens and pistils in different flowers on the same plant. (b) In cryptogams, having both male and female organs on the same individual. — 2. In zoöl., having both male and female sexual organs; hermaphrodite; androgynous: applied according to the corresponding usage in botany: opposed to diœcious. In numberless lower invertebrates the male and female products of generation, or ova and spermatozoa, mature in the same individual without sexual intercourse. In many other cases, as those of worms and snails, every individual is both male and female, but there is sexual intercourse and reciprocal impregnation between two individuals.

Branch of the Monœcious Tree Alnus Alnobetula. a, male catkins; b, female catkins; c, fruit.

monœciously, moneciously (mō-nē′shus-li), adv. In a monœcious manner; with a tendency to monœcism. — Monœciously polygamous, in bot. See polygamous.

monœcism, monecism (mō-nē′sizm), n. [⟨ monœc(ious) + -ism.] The state or quality of being monœcious; hermaphroditism; androgyneity.

monoembryony (mon-ō-em′bri-ō-ni), n. [⟨ Gr. μόνος, single, + ἔμβρυον, embryo: see embryo.] In bot., the condition of possessing only a single embryo, as the seeds of most angiosperms.

monoflagellate (mon-ō-flaj′e-lāt), a. [⟨ Gr. μόνος, single, + E. flagellate[1], a.] Monomastigate or uniflagellate, as a protozoan.

monogam (mon′ō-gam), n. [⟨ LL. monogamus, ⟨ LGr. μονόγαμος, married but once: see monogamous.] In bot., a plant that has solitary flowers with the anthers united.

Monogamia (mon-ō-gā′mi-ą), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ LGr. μονόγαμος, married but once: see monogamous.] In bot., one of the six orders of the nineteenth class, the Syngenesia, in the Linnean system, in which the flowers are solitary and have united anthers.

monogamian (mon-ō-gā′mi-ąn), a. Same as monogamous.

monogamic (mon-ō-gam′ik), a. [⟨ MGr. μονογαμικός, ⟨ μονόγαμος, one married but once: see monogam.] Same as monogamous. H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 227.

monogamist (mō-nog′ą-mist), n. [⟨ monogam-y + -ist.] 1. One who has been married only once; one who believes that a person should not marry oftener than once — that is, that a widower or widow should not remarry.

> I maintained . . . that it was unlawful for a priest of the Church of England, after the death of his first wife, to take a second, or, to express it in one word, I valued myself upon being a strict monogamist. Goldsmith, Vicar, ii.

2. One who has but one (living and undivorced) wife, as opposed to a bigamist or a polygamist.

monogamistic (mon″ō-ga-mis′tik), a. [⟨ monogamist + -ic.] Same as monogamous.

monogamous (mō-nog′ą-mus), a. [⟨ F. monogame = Sp. monógamo = Pg. It. monogamo, ⟨ LL. monogamus, ⟨ LGr. μονόγαμος, married but once, ⟨ Gr. μόνος, single, + γάμος, marriage.] 1. Practising or supporting the principle of monogamy. (a) Marrying only once — that is, not remarrying after the death of the spouse: opposed to digamous. (b) Marrying only one at a time: opposed to bigamous or polygamous.

2. Of or pertaining to monogamy: as, monogamous doctrines or customs. — 3. In zoöl., having only one mate; living in pairs: as, a monogamous family of birds. — 4. In bot., having solitary flowers with united anthers, as in Rapuntium. — Doubly monogamous, in ornith., said of birds the male of which takes part in nest-building, incubation, and care of the young, as pigeons and many other birds.

monogamy (mō-nog′ą-mi), n. [= F. monogamie = Sp. monogamia = Pg. It. monogamia, ⟨ LL. monogamia, ⟨ LGr. μονογαμία, single marriage, ⟨ μονόγαμος, married but once: see monogamous.] 1. The practice of marrying only once, or the principle which upholds that practice; the principle that forbids remarriage after the death of a former husband or wife: opposed to digamy. See bigamy, 2. — 2. The condition of being married to only one person at one time: opposed to bigamy or polygamy. See bigamy, 1.

> The monogamy of the modern and western world is, in fact, the monogamy of the Romans, from which the license of divorce has been expelled by Christian morality.
> Maine, Early Hist. of Institutions, p. 60.

3. In zoöl., the habit of having only one mate; the habit of living in pairs; the paired state. — Double monogamy, in ornith., the state or habit of being doubly monogamous. See phrase under monogamous.

monoganglionic (mon-ō-gang-gli-on′ik), a. [⟨ Gr. μόνος, single, + E. ganglion + -ic.] Having a single ganglion.

monogastric (mon-ō-gas′trik), a. [= F. monogastrique, ⟨ Gr. μόνος, single, + γαστήρ, stomach: see gaster[2], gastric.] Having only one stomach or digestive cavity. — Monogastric Diphyidæ or Diphydæ. See the quotation under diphyozooid.

Monogenea (mon-ō-jē′nē-ą), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Gr. μονογενής, only-begotten, single: see monogenous.] A division of fluke-worms or trematoids, containing those which undergo scarcely any change or comparatively little transformation in development: opposed to Digenea. There are several families and numerous genera.

monogeneous (mon-ō-jē′nē-us), a. [⟨ Gr. μόνος, single, + γένος, kind.] 1. In biol., generated in the same form as that of the parents; homogeneous as regards stages of development: specifically said of the Monogenea. — 2. In math., having a single differential coefficient.

monogenesis (mon-ō-jen′e-sis), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. μόνος, single, + γένεσις, origin: see genesis.] In biol.: (a) Development of the ovum from a parent similar to itself: opposed to metagenesis. E. van Beneden. (b) Generation of an individual from one parent which develops both male and female products, or ova and spermatozoa. A. Thomson. (c) Descent of all living things from a single cell. Haeckel.

monogenesy (mon-ō-jen′e-si), n. [As monogenesis.] Same as monogenism or monogony. Encyc. Dict.

monogenetic (mon″ō-jē-net′ik), a. [⟨ monogenesis, after genetic.] 1. Of or pertaining to monogenesis. — 2. Of or relating to monogenism.

> The monogenetic theory, which believes in the original common origin of all mankind from one pair.
> Science, VII. 169.

3. In geol., being the result of one genetic process: applied by Dana to mountain-ranges.

> The Appalachians, a range of many mountain ridges and valleys, constitute one individual among mountains, because a result of one genetic process, or, in a word, monogenetic. Dana, Man. of Geol. (3d ed.), p. 796.

monogenism (mō-noj′e-nism), n. [⟨ monogen-y + -ism.] The descent of the whole human race from a single pair. Also called monogeny. — Adamitic monogenism, the descent of the human race from Adam and Eve, according to the Mosaic account. Huxley, Critiques and Addresses, p. 159.

monogenist (mō-noj′e-nist), n. and a. [⟨ monogen-y + -ist.] I. n. 1. One who maintains the doctrine of monogenesis in any form.

> To meet the inevitable question of "Whence the first organic matter?" the Monogenist is reduced to enumerate the existing elements into which the simplest living jelly or sarcode is resolvable. Owen, Anat. (1868), iii. 817.

2. One who believes in the doctrine of monogenism.

> According to the Monogenists, all mankind have sprung from a single pair, whose multitudinous progeny spread themselves over the world.
> Huxley, Critiques and Addresses, p. 159.

II. a. Of or pertaining to monogenesis or monogenism: as, a monogenist theory.

monogenistic (mon″ō-je-nis′tik), a. [⟨ monogenist + -ic.] Same as monogenist.

monogenous (mō-noj′e-nus), a. [⟨ Gr. μονογενής, only-begotten, single, ⟨ μόνος, single, + -γενης, ⟨ √ γεν, produce: see -genous.] 1. Generated or generating by means of fission, gemmation, or sporulation, as modes of asexual reproduction.

> Reproduction by fission, which, with that by budding and spore-formation, is included under the term monogenous asexual reproduction.
> Claus, Zoölogy (trans.), p. 96.

2. Of or pertaining to monogenism. — 3. In math., having a single differential coefficient considered as a rule of generation. — Monogenous function, a function, $X + Yi$, of the complex variable $x + yi$, such that

$$\frac{\partial X}{\partial x} = \frac{\partial Y}{\partial y} \text{ and } \frac{\partial X}{\partial y} = -\frac{\partial Y}{\partial x}.$$

It is usually defined as a function having a differential coefficient.

monogeny (mō-noj′e-ni), n. [⟨ Gr. μόνος, single, + -γενεια, ⟨ √ γεν, produce: see -geny.] 1.

Same as monogony, 1, or monogenesis.—2. Same as monogenism.

monoglot (mon'ō-glot), a. [< LGr. μονόγλωττος, μονόγλωσσος, speaking but one language, < Gr. μόνος, single, + γλῶττα, Attic form of γλῶσσα, tongue, language.] 1. Speaking or using only one language.—2. Written or published in only one language.

monogoneutic (mon″ō-gō-nū'tik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + γονεύειν, produce, < γόνος, offspring, generation.] In entom., single-brooded; having only one brood during a year.

monogonic (mon-ō-gon'ik), a. [< monogony + -ic.] Of or pertaining to monogony: same as monogenous, 1.

Monogonopora (mon″ō-gō-nop'ō-rą), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of monogonoporus: see monogonoporous.] A division of dendrocœlous turbellarian worms, having the sexual opening single, whence the name. It contains the land and fresh-water planarians of the families Planariidæ and Geoplanidæ. Opposed to Digonopora.

monogonoporic (mon-ō-gon-ō-pō'rik), a. [As monogonopor-ous + -ic.] Having a single sexual opening or generative pore; specifically, pertaining to the Monogonopora, or having their characters.

monogonoporous (mon″ō-gō-nop'ō-rus), a. [< NL. monogonoporus, < Gr. μόνος, single, + γόνος, generation, + πόρος, passage.] Having a single genital pore, as a turbellarian; pertaining to the Monogonopora: opposed to digonoporous.

monogony (mō-nog'ō-ni), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + -γονία, < √ γεν, produce: see -gony.] 1. Asexual reproduction; agamogenesis: used by Haeckel in distinction from amphigony. Monogony is exhibited in the lowest animals, in which there is no sex, as in cases of reproduction by fission or gemmation without conjugation. The term is not applied to asexual modes of reproduction, as parthenogenesis, which occur in sexed animals. Also monogeny, monogenesy.

2. Same as monogenesis.

monogram (mon'ō-gram), n. [= F. monogramme = Sp. monograma = Pg. It. monogramma, < LL. monogramma, < Gr. μονογράμματον (not μονόγραμμα*), a character consisting of several letters in one, neut. of μονογράμματος, consisting of one letter (μονόγραμμος, drawn with single lines, outlined, > L. monogrammus, an outline sketch, skeleton, shadow), < μόνος, single, + γράμμα(τ-), letter: see *gram*2.] 1. One character in writing; a mark or design formed or consisting of one letter.

> If in compasse of no art it [my superficies] came > To be described by a monogram.
> B. Jonson, Discoveries, lxx.

2. Two or more of the letters of a name or word, or of the initials of several names or words, so combined as to form or appear to form a single character.

> That the founder was a Bishop Euphrasius is shown by his monogram on many of the stilts.
> E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 101.

3†. A picture drawn in lines without color; a sketch.

> A kind of first draught or ground colours only, and monogram of life. Hammond, Works, IV. 571. (Latham.)

★monogram-machine (mon'ō-gram-mą-shēn″), n. A foot-press used to stamp monograms, initials, etc., on paper and the like.

monogrammal (mon'ō-gram-al), a. [< monogram (LL. monogramma) + -al.] Same as monogrammatic. [Rare.]

monogrammatic (mon″ō-gra-mat'ik), a. [= F. monogrammatique, < LL. monogramma(t-), monogram: see monogram.] In the style or manner of a monogram; pertaining to monograms.

> One photo-lithographed plate of monogrammatic emblems, the meaning of which remains unknown.
> The Academy, April 6, 1889, p. 243.

monogrammic (mon-ō-gram'ik), a. [= F. monogrammique; as monogram (LL. monogramma) + -ic.] Same as monogrammatic.

monograph (mon'ō-grȧf), n. [= F. monographe = Pg. monographo, < Gr. μόνος, single, + γραφή, writing.] An account or description of a single thing or class of things; a treatise on a single subject or a single department, division, or detail of a branch of study.

> A monograph on the ant, as treated by Solomon, showing the harmony of the Book of Proverbs with the results of modern research. George Eliot, Middlemarch, xvii.

monograph (mon'ō-grȧf), v. t. [< monograph, n.] To write or produce a monograph on; treat in a monograph.

> The British species of Lumbricus have never been carefully monographed.
> Darwin, Formation of Vegetable Mould, p. 8.

monographer (mō-nog'rą-fėr), n. A writer of monographs.

monographic (mon-ō-graf'ik), a. [= F. monographique = Sp. monográfico = It. monografico; as monograph + -ic.] 1. Of or pertaining to a monograph; of the nature of a monograph.

> It does not pretend to monographic completeness, which would require far more profound and exhaustive studies.
> Science, VII. 95.

2. Pertaining to or of the nature of a monogram.

> A monographic combination of the letters A and P.
> Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 746.

3. Drawn in lines without colors.

monographical (mon-ō-graf'i-kal), a. [< monographic + -al.] Same as monographic.

monographically (mon-ō-graf'i-kal-i), adv. In the manner or form of a monograph.

monographist (mō-nog'rą-fist), n. [< monograph + -ist.] One who writes a monograph.

monographous (mō-nog'rą-fus), a. [< monograph + -ous.] Monographic.

monography (mō-nog'rą-fi), n. [= F. monographie = Sp. monografía = Pg. monographia = It. monografia, < Gr. μόνος, single, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] 1. A delineation in lines without colors; an outline sketch.—2. A monograph; also, a system of monographs.

> In order to write a complete monography of the Kashmiri style, we ought to be able to trace it very much further back than anything in the previous pages enables us to do. J. Fergusson, Hist. Indian Arch., p. 294.

monogyn (mon'ō-jin), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + γυνή, female (in mod. bot. a pistil).] In bot., a plant having only one style or stigma.

Monogynia (mon-ō-jin'i-ą), n. pl. [NL.: see monogyn.] In bot., the name of the first order in each of the first thirteen classes in the Linnean system, comprehending such plants as have only one pistil or stigma in a flower.

monogynian (mon-ō-jin'i-an), a. [< NL. Monogynia + -an.] Pertaining to the order Monogynia; having only one style or stigma.

monogynist (mō-noj'i-nist), n. [< monogyn-y + -ist.] One who adopts or favors monogyny.

monogynœcial (mon″ō-ji-nē'sial), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + NL. gynœcium + -al.] In bot., formed by the pistil of one flower: applied to simple fruits.

monogynous (mō-noj'i-nus), a. [< monogyn-y + -ous.] 1. Having only one wife; living in monogyny; monogamous, as a man: correlated with monandrous.—2. In zoöl., having only one female mate.—3. Same as monogynian.

monogyny (mō-noj'i-ni), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + γυνή, female.] In zoöl. and anthrop., a mating with only one female or wife; the monogynous state: correlated with monandry.

monohemerous (mon-ō-hē'me-rus), a. [< Gr. μονοήμερος, prop. μονήμερος, lasting one day only, < μόνος, single, + ἡμέρα, day.] In med., lasting or existing only one day.

monohydrated (mon-ō-hī'drā-ted), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + ὕδωρ (ὑδρ-), water: see hydrate.] Containing one molecule of water. This term was formerly applied to such acids as were regarded as formed from an oxid by the addition of one molecule of water, as monohydrated nitric acid, $(HNO_3)_2$, formed from the oxid N_2O_5 by adding a molecule of water, H_2O.

monohydric (mon-ō-hī'drik), a. [< mono- + hydr(ogen) + -ic.] Containing one atom of hydrogen. Specifically applied to such acids as have a single hydrogen atom replaceable by a basic atom or radical, as formic or lactic acid; and also to alcohols which by oxidation exchange two atoms of hydrogen for one of oxygen, and form acids containing the same number of carbon atoms as the alcohols from which they were derived.

Monoica (mō-noi'kȧ), n. pl. Same as Monœca.

monoid (mon'oid), a. and n. [< Gr. μονοειδής, of one form, uniform, < μόνος, single, + εἶδος, form.] I. a. In anc. pros., containing but one kind of foot: noting certain meters. Monoid meters are also called pure meters or simple meters, and distinguished from compound (episynthetic) meters and mixed or logaœdic meters.

II. n. In math., a surface which possesses a conical point of the highest possible (n—1)th order.

mono-ideism (mon″ō-ī-dē'izm), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + ἰδέα, idea (see idea), + -ism.] Concentration of the mind upon one thought or idea; a brooding on one subject; mild monomania. [Rare.]

> It is observed that the mental condition of hypnotised "subjects" is often one of marked mono-ideism—of strong and one-sided attention.
> Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, III. 407.

monolatry (mō-nol'ą-tri), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + λατρεία, service, worship: see latria.] The idolatrous or pagan worship of one divinity; also, the worship of one God, but not necessarily with an explicit disbelief in other divinities.

> Thus results a worship of one God—monolatry, as Wellhausen calls it—which is very different from genuine monotheism. Huxley, in Nineteenth Century, XIX. 495.

monolith (mon'ō-lith), n. [= F. monolithe = Sp. monolito = Pg. monolitho, a monolith, < LL. monolithus, < Gr. μονόλιθος, made of one stone, as a pillar or column, < μόνος, single, + λίθος, stone.] A single stone; by extension, any structure or object in stone formed of a single piece: it may be an independent monument standing alone, as an Egyptian obelisk, or a menhir, or any part of a structure, as a column.

monolithal (mon'ō-lith-al), a. [< monolith + -al.] Same as monolithic.

monolithic (mon-ō-lith'ik), a. [= F. monolithique = Pg. monolithico; as monolith + -ic.] 1. Formed of a single stone, as an obelisk or the shaft of a column.—2. Consisting of monoliths: as, a monolithic circle.—3. Of or pertaining to a monolith.

> There is no doubt that their monolithic character is the principal source of the awe and wonder with which they have been regarded.
> J. Fergusson, Hist. Indian Arch., p. 338.

monolobite (mō-nol'ō-bīt), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + λοβός, lobe (see lobe), + *-ite*2.] A trilobite in which the trilobed or tripartite character of the upper surface is almost lost, as in the genus Homalonotus.

monolobular (mon-ō-lob'ū-lăr), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + NL. lobulus, lobule: see lobular.] Consisting of or pertaining to a single lobe.

monolocular (mon-ō-lok'ū-lăr), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + L. loculus, a compartment (cell), dim. of locus, place: see loculus.] Same as unilocular.

Monolocularia (mon-ō-lok-ū-lā'ri-ą), n. pl. [NL.: see monolocular.] Those animals whose hearts are monolocular, or which have but one cardiac cavity. Wilder, Amer. Nat., 1887, p. 914.

monologian†, n. [< monology + -an.] Same as monologue, 1. Minsheu.

monologist (mō-nol'ō-jist), n. [= Sp. monologista; as monologue + -ist.] 1. One who talks in monologue or soliloquizes.—2. A monopolizer of conversation. De Quincey.

monologue (mon'ō-log), n. [< F. monologue = Sp. monólogo = Pg. It. monologo, a sole speaker, also a soliloquy, < LGr. μονόλογος, speaking alone or to oneself, < Gr. μόνος, alone, + λέγειν, speak.] 1†. One who does all the talking. Minsheu.—2. That which is spoken by one person alone. Especially—(a) A dramatic soliloquy. (b) A kind of dramatic entertainment, consisting of recitations, imitations, anecdotes, songs, etc., performed throughout by one person.

> He [Charles Mathews] instituted in 1818, in imitation of Foote and Dibdin, a species of entertainment in the form of a monologue, which, under the title of "Mathews at Home," proved very successful. Amer. Cyc., XI. 279.

(c) A long speech or harangue uttered by one person, especially in the course of a conversation.

> He sate at the feet of the teacher and listened with much apparent interest to monologues, not one-fifth part of which he could anyways understand. W. Black.
>
> His [Wordsworth's] finest passages are always monologues. Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 240.

monologuize (mon'ō-log-īz), v. i.; pret. and pp. monologuized, ppr. monologuizing. [< monologue + -ize.] To soliloquize. [Rare.]

> Her lips had a habit of silently monologuizing, moving in the manner of one who speaks with great rapidity, but with no audible utterance.
> W. Besant, Children of Gibeon, i.

monology (mō-nol'ō-ji), n. [< LGr. μονολογία, simple language (taken in sense of 'a soliloquy'), < μονόλογος, speaking alone: see monologue.] The act or habit of indulging in monologues, or of monopolizing conversation by long narratives or dissertations; the habit of soliloquizing.

> It was not by an insolent usurpation that Coleridge persisted in monology through his whole life. De Quincey.

monomachia (mon-ō-mā'ki-ą), n. [LL.: see monomachy.] Same as monomachy.

monomachist (mō-nom'ą-kist), n. [< monomach-y + -ist.] One who fights in single combat; a duelist. [Rare.] monomachy (mō-nom'ą-ki), n. [Also monomachia; < F. monomachie = Sp. monomaquia = Pg. It. monomachia, < LL. monomachia, < Gr. μονομαχία, single combat, < μονομάχος, fighting in single combat, < μόνος, single, + μάεσθαι, fight.] A single combat; a duel.

> Heroicall monomachies.
> Harvey, Pierce's Supererogation (1593).

There is to be performed a monomachy,
Combat, or duel, time, place, and weapon
Agreed betwixt us.
Webster and Rowley, Cure for a Cuckold, i. 2.

monomane (mon'ō-mān), n. [< F. monomane (= Pg. monomano), < monomanie, monomania: see monomania.] One afflicted with monomania; a monomaniac. [Rare.]

monomania (mon-ō-mā'ni-ạ), n. [= F. monomanie = Sp. monomanía = Pg. It. monomania, < NL. monomania, < Gr. μόνος, single, + μανία, madness: see mania.] 1. Insanity in which there is a more or less complete limitation of the perverted mental action to a particular field, as a specific delusion, or an impulse to do some particular thing. The other mental functions may show some signs of degeneration.—2. In popular use, an unreasonable zeal for or interest in some one thing; a craze.

Frederic was as anxious as any prince could be about the efficiency of his army. But this anxiety never degenerated into a monomania, like that which led his father to pay fancy prices for giants.
Macaulay, Frederic the Great.

Instinctive monomania, the excessive tendency to do some particular thing without intelligible motive and unrestrained by considerations of propriety, morality, or personal prudence. Persons manifesting this form of mental derangement usually have exhibited signs of more or less extensive mental degeneration. It includes suicidal insanity, homicidal insanity, dipsomania, pyromania, kleptomania, and certain forms of perverted sexual instinct. Also called impulsive insanity. =Syn. 1. Lunacy, Derangement, etc. See insanity.

monomaniac (mon-ō-mā'ni-ak), a. and n. [= F. monomaniaque = Sp. It. monomaniaco; as monomania + -ac.] I. a. Same as monomaniacal.

II. n. 1. A person affected by monomania.—2. In law, one who is insane upon some one or more subjects, and apparently sane upon all others.

monomaniacal (mon"ō-mā-nī'ạ-kạl), a. [< monomaniac + -al.] Of or pertaining to monomania; also, afflicted with monomania.

Patients confess that they have been under the influence of monomaniacal ideas and terrible hallucinations for a long period, without their existence being suspected even by their most intimate associates.
F. B. Winslow, Obscure Diseases of the Brain, ix.

Monomastiga (mon-ō-mas'ti-gạ), n. pl. [NL. (in neuter) pl. of Monomastix.] A division of flagellate protozoans having one flagellum, as the Monadidæ, etc.: distinguished from Dimastiga.

monomastigate (mon-ō-mas'ti-gāt), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + μάστιξ (μαστιγ-), a whip, scourge.] Having one flagellum; uniflagellate: said of the Monomastiga.

Monomastix (mon-ō-mas'tiks), n. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + μάστιξ (μαστιγ-), a whip, scourge.] A genus of uniflagellate protozoans proposed by Diesing in 1850, giving name to the Monomastiga.

monome (mon'ōm), n. [< F. monôme = Sp. Pg. It. monomio, < NL. monomium*, for mononomium*, < Gr. μόνος, single, + L. nom(en), name. Hence monomial. Cf. binomial.] Same as monomial.

Monomera† (mō-nom'ẹ-rạ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μονομερής, consisting of one part, single: see monomerous.] A section of coleopterous insects proposed by Latreille for the reception of certain minute species. It is now known that his observations were imperfect, these insects having really several tarsal joints, and pertaining to families which Latreille had included in other groups.

Monomerosomata (mō-nom"ẹ-rō-sō'ma-tạ), n. pl. [NL.: see monomerosomatous.] The acarids or mites as an order of tracheate arachnidans; the Acarida or Acaridea. In Leach's system there were 4 orders of Arachnida—Dimerosomata, spiders; Polymerosomata scorpions, etc.; Monomerosomata, mites; and Podosomata, the Pycnogonidæ. Westwood interposed Adelarthrosomata between the second and the third of these.

monomerosomatous (mō-nom"ẹ-rō-som'ạ-tus), a. [< Gr. μονομερής, consisting of one part (see monomerous), + σῶμα (σωματ-), body.] Having the body all in one piece or mass—that is, apparently unsegmented—as an acarid; of or pertaining to the Monomerosomata, or having their characters, as a mite: distinguished from dimerosomatous, polymerosomatous, etc.

monomerous (mō-nom'ẹ-rus), a. [< Gr. μονομερής, consisting of one part, < μόνος, single, + μέρος, part.] 1. In zoöl., having the tarsi single-jointed; uniarticulate, as a tarsus; specifically, of or pertaining to the Monomera.—2. In bot., having but one member in each cycle (pistil, stamen, petal, or sepal): said of a flower. Compare dimerous, 2.

monometallic (mon"ō-me-tal'ik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + μέταλλον, metal: see metal.] Consisting of but one metal; specifically, comprising coins that consist of but one metal (or alloy), as gold or silver: as, a monometallic currency.

monometallism (mon-ō-met'ạl-izm), n. [< monometall(ic) + -ism.] The use of only one metal as a standard of value in the coinage of a country; also, the economic theory that advocates such a single standard. See bimetallism.

monometallist (mon-ō-met'ạl-ist), n. [< monometall(ic) + -ist.] One who advocates the theory of monometallism: opposed to bimetallist.

monometer (mō-nom'e-tẽr), a. and n. [< LL. monometer, as a noun monometron, < Gr. μονόμετρος, consisting of one measure, < μόνος, single, + μέτρον, a measure: see *meter*2.] I. a. In pros., consisting of a single measure.

II. n. In pros., a meter consisting of a single measure.

monometric (mon-ō-met'rik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + μέτρον, measure. Cf. monometer.] In crystal., same as isometric, 2.

monometrical (mon-ō-met'ri-kạl), a. [< monometer + -ic-al.] Pertaining to or consisting of monometers; containing only one meter.

monomial (mō-nō'mi-ạl), a. and n. [< monome (NL. monomium*) + -al. Cf. binomial, multinomial, polynomial. See also mononomial.] I. a. 1. In alg., consisting of only one term, and not of several added together.—2. In zoöl. and bot., same as mononomial.—Monomial differentiant. See differentiant.

II. n. In alg., an expression or quantity consisting of a single term. See binomial. Also monome.

Monomorium (mon-ō-mō'ri-um), n. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + μόριον, dim. of μόρος, a part, piece.] A genus of Formicidæ, having the metathorax unarmed, the mandibles narrow, and the antennæ 11- or 12-jointed. It is wide-spread, with many species, among them the common little red ant, M. pharaonis. This well-known domestic pest America owes Pharaoh's Ant (Monomorium pharaonis).

1, female; 2, worker. (Lines show natural sizes.)

to Europe, though it has generally been considered of American origin; it is now almost cosmopolitan. It does no great damage, but is troublesome from its myriads, its habit of overrunning almost everything in the house that is eatable, and the great difficulty or impossibility of its extermination.

monomorphic (mon-ō-mor'fik), a. [As monomorph-ous + -ic.] 1. In zoöl., of one and the same (or essentially similar) type of structure; formed much alike; notably uniform in morphic character: said of a number of animals collectively, or of the zoölogical group which they constitute: as, birds are a highly monomorphic class of animals.—2. In entom., having but one form, structure, or morphological character; identical or invariable in form throughout successive stages of development; monomorphous; homomorphous; ametabolic.

monomorphous (mon-ō-môr'fus), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + μορφή, form.] 1. Same as monomorphic in any sense.—2. Of invariable form: specifically applied to certain neuropterous insects which in their larval state are similar in form to the perfect insect, though wingless.

monomphalus (mō-nom'fạ-lus), n.; pl. monomphali (-lī). [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + ὀμφαλός, navel.] In teratol., a double monster, each person being nearly complete, but united with the other in a common umbilicus.

Monomyaria (mon"ō-mī-ā'ri-ạ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + μῦς, muscle, + -aria.] An order of bivalve mollusks with a single adductor muscle, or with one such muscle enlarged at the expense of another, subcentral in position and remote from the pallial margin. The order contains the scallops, oysters, pearl-oysters, and related forms, and is nearly coincident with Asiphonata. See cut under ciborium.

monomyarian (mon"ō-mī-ā'ri-ạn), a. and n. [< Monomyaria + -an.] I. a. Having one adductor muscle, as an oyster; specifically, of or pertaining to the Monomyaria. Also monomyary.

II. n. A monomyarian bivalve mollusk.

monomyary (mon-ō-mī'ạ-ri), a. and n. [= F. monomyaire, < NL. Monomyaria.] Same as monomyarian.

Mononeura (mon-ō-nū'rạ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + νεῦρον, nerve.] Animals with only a ganglionic nervous system. Rudolphi.

mononomial (mon-ō-nō'mi-ạl), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + L. nom(en), name: see nominal. Cf. monomial.] In zoöl. and bot., consisting of a single word or term: applied to the name of an animal or a plant: opposed to binomial and polynomial. Coues, The Auk, I. 320. Also monomial.

mononuclear (mon-ō-nū'klē-ạr), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + L. nucleus, nucleus: see nuclear.] Having a single nucleus; uninuclear: as, large mononuclear cells. Hueppe, Bacteriological Investigations (trans.), p. 68.

Mononychinæ (mon"ō-ni-kī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Mononyx (-onych-) + -inæ.] A subfamily of Galgulidæ, typified by the genus Mononyx. It contains heteropterous insects of flattened form, truncate in front, rounded behind, and rough on top; of dull or dark color; and with the fore legs raptorial, fitted for clutching insect prey.

mononym (mon'ō-nim), n. [< Gr. μονώνυμος, having one name, < μόνος, single, + ὄνομα, ὄννμα, a name: see onym.] A name consisting of a single term; a mononomial name in zoölogy. Coues, The Auk, I. 321.

mononymic (mon-ō-nim'ik), a. [< mononym + -ic.] Having but one name; named in one word; mononomial: applied in zoölogy to a system of nomenclature in which the name of each species is a single word: opposed to dionymal and polyonymic.

In a mononymic system we should require as many separate names as there are objects to be named.
J. W. Dunning, Entomol. Monthly Mag., VIII. 274.

mononymization (mon-ō-nim-i-zā'shọn), n. [< mononymize + -ation.] The substitution of a single word for several which had been used together as the name of something, as the employment of the name iter for a part of the brain usually called iter a tertio ad quartum ventriculum. [Rare.]

The desired mononymization is best attained by simply dropping the superfluous genitive [in the phrase "torcular Herophili"].
Buck's Handbook of Med. Sciences, VIII. 525, note.

mononymize (mon'ō-nim-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. mononymized, ppr. mononymizing. [< mononym + -ize.] To convert (a polynomial name) into a mononym.

Mononyx (mon'ō-niks), n. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + ὄνυξ, a nail: see onyx.] In entom.: (a) The typical genus of Mononychinæ, founded by Laporte in 1837. M. amplicollis is a large, broad South American species; M. stygius is found in the southern United States. (b†) An unused genus of coleopterous insects. Brullé, 1838.

monoöusian (mon-ō-ö'si-ạn), a. Same as monoöusious.

monoöusious (mon-ō-ö'si-us), a. [< LGr. μονοούσιος, of single essence, < Gr. μόνος, single, + οὐσία, essence, < ὤν (fem. οὖσα), ppr. of εἶναι, be: see *be*1, ens. Cf. homoöusious.] Having the same substance; consisting of the same matter: used to describe the Sabellian confounding of God the Father and God the Son.

monoparesis (mon-ō-par'e-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + πάρεσις, a weakening, paralysis: see paresis.] In pathol., the paresis of a single part of the body, as of one limb.

monopathic (mon-ō-path'ik), a. [< monopath-y + -ic.] In pathol., involving the disorder of only one organ or function: said of disease.

monopathy (mō-nop'ạ-thi), n. [< LGr. μονοπάθεια, suffering in one part of the body only, < Gr. μόνος, single, + πάθος, suffering.] 1†. Solitary suffering or sensibility.

Every one calculateth his nativity, and sentenceth his own future fate, by crying at his birth; not coming only from the body's monopathy, or sole suffering by change of its warm quarters: but, according to some, from sympathy with the divining soul, that knoweth itself for a time banished from the Father of Spirits.
Whitlock, Manners of the English (1654), p. 32. (Latham.)

2. In pathol., a disease or affection in which only one organ or function is disordered.

monopersonal (mon-ō-pėr'son-ạl), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + L. persona, person: see personal.] In theol., having but one person or one mode of existence.

monopetalous (mon-ō-pet'ạ-lus), a. [= F. monopétale = Sp. monopétalo = Pg. It. monopetalo, < Gr. μόνος, single, + πέταλον, leaf (petal).] In bot., having the petals united into one piece by their edges: more properly gamopetalous or sympetalous.

monophanous (mō-nof'a-nus), a. [< LGr. μονοφανής, visible alone, < Gr. μόνος, single, alone, + φαίνεσθαι, appear.] Having an appearance similar to something else; resembling each other. [Rare.] Imp. Dict.

Monophlebites (mon″ō-fle-bī'tēz), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + φλέψ (φλεβ-), a vein, + -ites, E. -ite[2].] A tribe or section of the homopterous subfamily Coccinæ, including the largest bark-lice known. Some Australian forms are nearly two inches long.

monophobia (mon-ō-fō'bi-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + -φοβία, < φέβεσθαι, fear (> φόβος, fear).] In pathol., morbid dread of being left alone.

monophonic (mon-ō-fon'ik), a. [< monophon-y + -ic.] Same as monodic.

monophonous (mon'ō-fō-nus), a. [< Gr. μονόφωνος, with but one voice or sound, < Gr. μόνος, single, + φωνή, voice.] Producing a single sound or note at one time: said of an instrument.

monophony (mon'ō-fō-ni), n. [As monophon-ous + -y[3].] Same as monody, 1.

monophote (mon'ō-fōt), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + φώς (φῶτ-), light.] An electric arc-lamp regulator designed to work in single series, or on the parallel-arc system, between the leads of an electric-light circuit. More fully named monophote regulator.

monophthalmus (mon-of-thal'mus), n. [NL., < Gr. μονόφθαλμος, one-eyed, < μόνος, single, + ὀφθαλμός, the eye.] In teratol., a monster with one eye; a cyclops.

The term anophthalmus unilateralis would seem to serve better . . . than the term monophthalmus, given by some writers. Medical News, LII. 636.

monophthong (mon'of-thông), n. [< Gr. μονόφθογγος, of or with but one sound, containing but one vowel; as a noun, a single vowel; < μόνος, single, + φθόγγος, sound. Cf. diphthong.] 1. A simple vowel-sound.

Again, the sound of the so-called long English a in make, paper, &c., although once a monophthong, is now pronounced as a diphthong. Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 782.

2. A combination of two written vowels pronounced as one.

monophthongal (mon'of-thông-gąl), a. [< monophthong + -al.] Consisting of or pertaining to a monophthong.

monophthongization (mon-of-thông-gi-zā'shon), n. [< monophthongize + -ation.] The reduction of a diphthong to a single sound.

Examples of the monophthongization of ει, so far as they are found in the text of the Homeric poems.
Amer. Jour. Philol., VI. 420.

monophthongize (mon'of-thông-gīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. monophthongized, ppr. monophthongizing. [< monophthong + -ize.] To reduce in enunciation to a single sound.

A monophthongized diphthong.
Amer. Jour. Philol., VI. 435.

monophyletic (mōn″ō-fi-let'ik), a. [< Gr. μονόφυλος, of one tribe, < Gr. μόνος, single, + φυλή, a tribe, > φυλέτης, a tribesman, φυλετικός, belonging to a tribesman: see phylum.] Of or pertaining to a single phylum: said of a group of any grade in zoölogy, with reference to the origin of all the members of such group from a common ancestor: opposed to polyphyletic. The monophyletic hypothesis, in its logical application to the animal kingdom, derives all animals from a single prototype; it is equivalent to the monogenetic hypothesis in phylogeny.

My gastræa theory, on which I base the monophyletic genealogy of the animal kingdom.
Haeckel, Evol. of Man (trans.), I. 247.

monophylitic (mon″ō-fi-lit'ik), a. An erroneous form of monophyletic.

Polyphylitic origin, so far from being improbable, is as likely an occurrence as monophylitic origin.
Sollas, Encyc. Brit., XXII. 426.

monophylline (mon-ō-fil'in), a. [As monophyll-ous + -ine[1].] Same as monophyllous.

monophyllous (mon-ō-fil'us), a. [= F. monophylle = Pg. monophilo = It. monofilo, < Gr. μονόφυλλος, having but one leaf, < μόνος, single, + φύλλον, leaf.] In bot., having but one leaf; formed of one leaf.

Monophyllus (mon-ō-fil'us), n. [NL., < Gr. μονόφυλλος, having but one leaf: see monophyllous.] A genus of leaf-nosed bats of the family Phyllostomidæ, founded by Leach in 1822. M. redmani is a West Indian species, about 12 inches in extent, and of a grayish-brown color.

monophyodont (mon-ō-fī'ō-dont), a. and n. [< Gr. μονοφυής, of simple nature, single, as teeth (< μόνος, single, + φύειν, produce), + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] I. a. Having only one set of teeth: opposed to diphyodont and polyphyodont.

II. n. An animal having only one set of teeth.

Monophyodonta (mon-ō-fī-ō-don'tą), n. pl. [NL.: see monophyodont.] A division of mammals containing those which are monophyodont, as the cetaceans. Sir R. Owen.

Monophysite (mō-nof'i-sīt), n. and a. [= F. monophysite, < LGr. μονοφυσίτης, one who held that Christ has but one nature, < Gr. μόνος, single, + φύσις, nature: see physic.] I. n. One who holds that there is but one nature in Christ; more specifically, one of a sect which teaches that there is but one commingled or compound nature in Christ, partly divine and partly human, in contradistinction to the orthodox doctrine that by the incarnation two complete and perfect natures, the divine and the human, are united without confusion or mutation in the one person of Christ. Among Monophysites in the wider sense are included the Eutychians and Monothelites. The sect of Eutychians was founded by Eutyches, who was condemned at the Council of Chalcedon, A. D. 451. They taught that there is but one nature in Christ, the divine. The Monophysites properly so called hold that the divine and human natures in Christ are combined into one composite nature. The first leaders of the Monophysites, and founders of the present Monophysite or Coptic Church of Egypt, were Dioscorus, condemned at Chalcedon (died A. D. 454), and Timothy Ælurus ('Cat'), made patriarch A. D. 457. In later times their most important leader was Severus, about A. D. 520, whose followers were called Severians, Corrupticolæ, or Phthartolatræ, while those of an opposite Monophysite sect were known as Julianists, Aphthartodocetæ, and Phantasiasts. In the sixth century the Monophysites spread widely in Syria, and were named Jacobites, from Jacob Baradæus, Bishop of Edessa, 541–78. At various times the Monophysites divided into a great number of sects, known by more than thirty different titles. These represented different shades of original Eutychianism and Monophysitism and attempts at approach to orthodoxy. The most subtle form of Monophysitism is Monothelitism (which see). Monophysitism is at the opposite pole of doctrine to Nestorianism, the orthodox doctrine as to the nature of Christ lying midway between the two. As distinguished from the Monophysites, the orthodox are called Diphysites and Melchites. At the present day the two great bodies of Monophysites are the Copts and the Syrian Jacobites. The Armenian Church is also often regarded as Monophysite or Eutychian, and the Maronites before their submission to the Roman Church were Monothelites. See Acephali (b), Agnoëtæ, Theopaschite, Tritheist.

II. a. Same as Monophysitical.

Monophysitical (mon″ō-fi-sit'i-kąl), a. [< Monophysite + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to the Monophysites or their doctrines; of the nature of the doctrines of the Monophysites.

Monophysitism (mō-nof'i-sī-tizm), n. [< Monophysite + -ism.] The doctrines of the Monophysites. Compare diphysitism.

Eutychianism revived in the form of Monophysitism, or the doctrine that Christ had but one composite nature. It makes the humanity of Christ a mere accident of the immutable divine nature.
Schaff, Christ and Christianity, p. 62.

monoplacid (mon'ō-plas-id), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + πλακοῦς, a flat cake: see placenta.] Having but one madreporic plate, as a starfish: distinguished from polyplacid.

monoplacula (mon-ō-plak'ū-lą), n.; pl. monoplaculæ (-lē). [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + NL. placula, q. v.] A single-layered germ; a placula of one layer of cells, formed by vertical fission of the germ: opposed to diploplacula. Hyatt, Proc. Bost. Soc. Nat. Hist., 1884, p. 89.

monoplacular (mon-ō-plak'ū-lăr), a. [< monoplacula + -ar[3].] Single-layered, as a germ; having the characteristics of a monoplacula.

monoplaculate (mon-ō-plak'ū-lāt), a. [< monoplacula + -ate[1].] Same as monoplacular. A. Hyatt.

monoplast (mon'ō-plăst), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + πλαστός, formed, molded, < πλάσσειν, form, mold.] An organism consisting of a single cell; a simple or homogeneous form-element.

monoplastic (mon-ō-plas'tik), a. [< monoplast + -ic.] Of or pertaining to a monoplast.

monoplegia (mon-ō-plē'ji-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + πληγή, stroke.] In pathol., paralysis limited to a single part, as of one arm or leg. Compare hemiplegia, paraplegia.

monopleurobranch (mon-ō-plö'rō-brangk), a. and n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + πλευρά, side, + βράγχια, gills.] I. a. Having gills on only one side; of or pertaining to the Monopleurobranchiata.

II. n. A member of the Monopleurobranchiata.

Monopleurobranchia (mon-ō-plö-rō-brang'ki-ą), n. pl. [NL.: see monopleurobranch.] Same as Monopleurobranchiata.

monopleurobranchian (mon-ō-plö-rō-brang'ki-ąn), a. and n. [< monopleurobranch + -ian.] Same as monopleurobranch.

Monopleurobranchiata (mon-ō-plö-rō-brang-ki-ā'tą), n. pl. [NL.: see monopleurobranch.] A suborder of opisthobranchiate gastropods having plumose gills usually on one side, the right, under the edge of the mantle. This name was proposed by De Blainville in 1825 as that of the third order of his Paracephalophora monoica, divided into 4 families, as the sea-hares and their allies. It is synonymous with Tectibranchiata of Cuvier. The group is also called Pomatobranchiata. Also Monopleurobranchia. J. E. Gray, 1821.

monopleurobranchiate (mon-ō-plö-rō-brang'ki-āt), a. and n. [< monopleurobranch + -ate[1].] Same as monopleurobranch.

Monopneumona (mon-op-nū'mō-nă), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl.: see Monopneumones.] A division of Dipneusta or Dipnoi, containing those dipnoans which are single-lunged: distinguished from Dipneumona. The only existing representative is Neoceratodus.

Monopneumones (mon-op-nū'mō-nēz), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + πνεύμων, lung, usually pl. πνεύμονες, the lungs.] Same as Monopneumona.

Monopneumonia (mon″op-nū-mō'ni-ą), n. pl. [NL.: see Monopneumones.] Same as Monopneumona.

monopneumonian (mon″op-nū-mō'ni-ąn), a. and n. [As Monopneumonia + -an.] I. a. Having only one lung: specifically applied to the Monopneumonia.

II. n. A lung-fish, as Ceratodus.

monopneumonous (mon-op-nū'mō-nus), a. [As Monopneumones + -ous.] Having only one lung; of or pertaining to the Monopneumona, Monopneumones, or Monopneumonia.

Monopnoa (mo-nop'nō-ą), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + -πνοος, breathing, < πνεῖν, breathe.] In Owen's classification, a "subclass of Reptilia," containing all reptiles which breathe in one way only — that is, by lungs: distinguished from Dipnoa or Branchiotoca, which breathe in two ways — that is, either by gills first and lungs afterward in the case of the same individual, or some of them by gills and others by lungs. In this scheme, not easy to define satisfactorily, Prof. Owen makes his "class Reptilia" cover not only Reptilia in the usual sense, but also Amphibia or Batrachia. His Dipnoa are then conterminous with Amphibia proper. He divides Monopnoa into the orders Pterosauria, Dinosauria, Crocodilia, Chelonia, Lacertilia, Ophidia, Anomodontia, Sauropterygia, and Ichthyopterygia. Comp. Anat. Vert. (1868), III. 850.

monopode (mon'ō-pōd), a. and n. [Cf. LL. monopodius, one-footed, L. monopodium, a table or stand with one foot, < Gr. μονόπους (μονοποδ-), one-footed, < μόνος, single, + πούς (ποδ-) = E. foot.] I. a. Having but one foot.

II. n. 1. Any object supported on one foot only; specifically, one of a fabled race of men having but one leg. These, the Monoscelli or Sciopodes, are described by Pliny (Hist. Nat., viii.) as dwelling in Ethiopia, and as possessing a single foot, so large that it served when held up to shade them from the sun when they lay down to rest.

The monopodes, sheltering themselves from the sun beneath their single umbrella-like foot.
Lowell, Fireside Travels, p. 172.

2. In bot., same as monopodium.

monopodial (mon-ō-pō'di-ąl), a. [< monopodium + -al.] Resembling or after the manner of a monopodium.

monopodic (mon-ō-pod'ik), a. [As monopod-y + -ic.] In pros., constituting a single foot; of or pertaining to a single foot, or a measure consisting in a single foot: as, monopodic measurement: opposed to dipodic.

monopodium (mon-ō-pō'di-um), n.; pl. monopodia (-ą). [NL., neut. of LL. monopodius, < Gr. μονόπους, one-footed: see monopode.] In bot., an axis of growth which continues to extend at the apex in the direction of previous growth, while lateral structures of like kind are produced beneath it in acropetal succession. Goebel. Compare sympodium and dichotomy.

monopody (mon'ō-pod-i), n.; pl. monopodies (-iz). [< LL. monopodia, < Gr. μονοποδία, a single foot, esp. as a measure, < μόνος, single, + πούς (ποδ-) = E. foot.] In pros., a measure consisting of but one foot: opposed to dipody. See measure, 11.

monopolert, n. [< OF. monopolier (F. monopoleur), < monopole, monopoly: see monopoly.] A monopolist. Cotgrave.

monopolical† (mon-ō-pol'i-kąl), a. [< monopolic* (= Pg. monopolico) (< monopol-y + -ic) + -al.] Monopolistic.

I wish, according to the decree of Darius, that whosoeuer is an enemy to our peace, and seeketh, either by getting monipolicall patents or by forging vniust tales, to hinder our welfare, that his house was pulled downe.
Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, II. 58.

monopolisation, monopolise, etc. See monopolization, etc.

monopolist (mō-nop′ō-list), n. [= Sp. Pg. It. monopolista; as monopol-y + -ist.] 1. One who monopolizes or possesses a monopoly; one who has exclusive command or control of any branch of trade or article of commerce; specifically, a buyer up of the whole of a commodity in market for the purpose of selling at an advanced price; one having a license or privilege granted by authority for the sole buying or selling of any commodity. See monopoly.—2. One who obtains, assumes, or occupies anything to the exclusion of others: as, a monopolist of advantages.

monopolistic (mō-nop-ō-lis′tik), a. [< monopolist + -ic.] Relating to a monopoly or to a system of monopolies; of a kind promoted by monopoly; existing for the maintenance of a monopoly: as, monopolistic abuses; a monopolistic corporation.

monopolitan† (mon-ō-pol′i-tạn), n. [As monopolite + -an, after the erroneously assumed analogy of cosmopolitan, etc.] A monopolist.

Hee was no diving politician,
Or project-seeking monopolitan.
John Taylor, Works (1630). (Nares.)

Monopolitans of starch, tin, fish, cloth, oil, vinegar, salt, and what not. Quoted in Oldys's Sir Walter Raleigh.

monopolite† (mō-nop′ō-līt), n. [< monopol-y + -ite, after the erroneously assumed analogy of cosmopolite.] Same as monopolist.

You marchant Mercers, and Monopolites, Gain-greedy Chap-men, periur'd Hypocrites.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 3.

monopolization (mō-nop″ō-li-zā′shọn), n. [< monopolize + -ation.] The act or process of monopolizing. Also spelled monopolisation.

monopolize (mō-nop′ō-līz), v. t.; pret. and pp. monopolized, ppr. monopolizing. [= F. monopoliser = Sp. monopolizar = Pg. monopolisar; as monopol-y + -ize.] 1. To obtain a monopoly of; have an exclusive right of trading in: as, to monopolize all the corn in a district.

The Arabs have a law that, if three camels depart at the same time, the convent shall be obliged to pay thirty piasters; which I suppose is designed to prevent any one Arab with several camels monopolizing the whole business of conveying the monks.
Pococke, Description of the East, I. 159.

2. To obtain or engross the whole of; obtain exclusive possession of.

As if this age had monopolized all goodness to itself.
Fuller.

Gold alone does Passion move,
Gold monopolizes Love!
Cowley, Anacreontics, vii.

Also spelled monopolise.

monopolizer (mō-nop′ō-lī-zėr), n. Same as monopolist, especially in sense 2: as, a monopolizer of conversation. Also spelled monopoliser.

Those senseless monopolizers of time that form the court of a duke. Shelley, in Dowden, I. 204.

monopoly (mō-nop′ō-li), n.; pl. monopolies (-liz). [= F. monopole = Sp. Pg. It. monopolio, < L. monopolium, < Gr. μονοπώλιον, a right of exclusive sale, μονοπωλία, exclusive sale, monopoly, < μόνος, sole, + πωλεῖν, barter, sale.] 1. An exclusive privilege to carry on a traffic.

Monopolies are much the same offence in other branches of trade that engrossing is in provisions, being a license or privilege allowed by the king for the sole buying and selling, making, working, or using of any thing whatsoever; whereby the subject in general is restrained from that liberty of manufacturing or trading which he had before. Blackstone, Com. (ed. Waite), IV. 159.

2. Specifically, in Eng. constitutional hist., and hence sometimes in Amer. law, such an exclusive privilege when granted by the crown or state to an individual, association, or corporation, for the sake of the pecuniary advantage of its exclusiveness. A privilege not granted by the state, but secured by buying up the article, is termed by the English law engrossing. The legal objection to a monopoly, in this sense of the word, is that it can be secured only by forbidding all other citizens except the favored grantee to exercise a common-law right. Exclusive privileges granted by the state to a limited number of persons for the sake of enabling the state the better to regulate the traffic for the protection of the rest of the community, as in case of banking franchises, liquor traffic, etc., are not deemed monopolies, although the same privileges would be, if conferred on a single or a very few grantees, for the sake of the pecuniary benefit to them. So the exclusive privileges conferred on inventors and authors, by the patent and copyright laws, for the sake of the encouragement of the arts and literature, and extending only to articles originally devised under that encouragement, are not deemed monopolies. Both these classes of grants have, however, been condemned by some as partaking of the character of monopolies.

If any man, out of his own wit, industry, or endeavour, find out anything beneficial to the Commonwealth, or bring out any new invention which every subject of this kingdom may use, yet, in regard of his pains and travel therein, her Majesty perhaps is pleased to grant him a privilege to use the same only, by himself or his deputies, for a certain time. This is one kind of Monopoly. Sometimes there is a glut of things, when they be in excessive quantity, as perhaps of corn; and perhaps her Majesty gives licence of transportation to one man. This is another kind of Monopoly. Sometimes there is a scarcity or a small quantity; and the like is granted also.
Bacon, in E. A. Abbott's Account of his Life and Works.

I will have no private monopolies, to enrich one man, and beggar a multitude.
Burton, Anat. of Mel., To the Reader, p. 68.

3. In polit. econ., control of the production, purchase, or sale of a commodity or service, so unified as to render possible the manipulation of prices in the interest of the person or persons in control. Monopoly does not necessarily imply the absolute control of the entire supply of a commodity or service; most frequently it consists merely in a dominant position which gives substantial price-making power. Monopoly control may be exercised by the state for fiscal or regulative purposes, as the tobacco monopoly of France. It may be granted to individuals, as the exclusive trading privileges enjoyed by joint-stock companies in early modern times, or the franchise of a street-railway company. Such control may also be secured through the combination of buyers, producers, or sellers of a commodity or service, or through the absorption by one business of competing businesses. When monopoly of this kind arises from the acquisition by one person or group of persons of all available sources of limited natural products, it is usually termed natural monopoly; when its existence is due to the superior competing power of a great aggregate of capital, it is termed capitalistic monopoly. See virtual monopoly, below.

4. That which is the subject of a monopoly: as, in Bengal opium is a monopoly.—5. The possession or assumption of anything to the exclusion of other possessors.

To make a monopoly of his learning.
Dryden, tr. of Juvenal, Ded.

Caleb hain't no monopoly to court the seenoreetas.
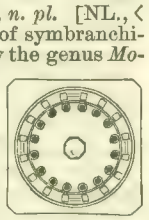
Lowell, Biglow Papers, 1st ser., ii.



6. Loosely, a company or corporation which enjoys a monopoly.—Monopoly Act, an English statute of 1623 (21 Jas. I., c. 3), declaring all monopolies for the manufacture, sale, or use of anything to be void, excepting to inventors their patent rights. Also known as the Statute of Monopolies.—Virtual monopoly, a term in constitutional law and the history of legislation (the appropriate applications of which have been much contested) used to characterize a business which, though not declared by law to be a monopoly or exclusive franchise protected as such, as by a patent or an exclusive charter, is yet so related to the great channels and currents of commerce that the allowing of it to enjoy the same protection as other private property and business secures to it indirectly exclusive advantages substantially equivalent to a legal monopoly. Thus the great grain-elevators of modern commerce, although erected as private property on private lands, if by their situation they have exclusive advantages for the transfer of grain from vessels at the wharf to the railroad terminus of a trunk-line, are said to constitute a virtual monopoly, because, if not subjected to a legislative power to restrict their charges such as other private property and business are not subjected to, they might be conducted in a manner oppressive to commerce.

monopolylogue (mon-ō-pol′i-log), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + πολύλογος, much talking, < πολύς, many, much, + λέγειν, speak.] An entertainment in which a single actor sustains many characters.

monoprionidian (mon-ō-prī-ō-nid′i-ạn), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + πρίων, a saw (< πρίειν, saw), + -ίδιον, dim. suffix, + -an.] Having small uniserial serrations; uniserrulate: specifically applied to those graptolites or rhabdophorous cœlenterates which have the cells or hydrothecæ in a single row: opposed to diprionidian.

monopteral (mō-nop′tę-rạl), a. [< monopteron + -al.] 1. In arch., formed as a monopteron.—2. In zoöl., having a single fin, wing, or alate part.

Monopteridæ (mon-op-ter′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Monopterus + -idæ.] A family of symbranchiate teleostean fishes, typified by the genus Monopterus, having the shoulder-girdle directly connected with the skull, and the abdominal and caudal regions of the body excessively elongated.

Plan of Monopteron.

monopteron, monopteros (mo-nop′tę-ron, -ros), n. [= F. monoptère = Sp. monopterio, < L. monopteros, < Gr. μονόπτερος, with only one row of pillars, < μόνος, single, + πτερόν, a wing, a row of columns along the sides of a Greek temple.] In arch., a type of temple or portico, usually with an inclosed circular cella, composed of columns arranged in a circle and supporting a cupola or a conical roof.

Monopteron.—Temple of Vesta at Tivoli, near Rome.

Monopterus (mō-nop′tę-rus), n. [NL. (cf. Gr. μονόπτερος, lit. having one wing (see monopteron), < Gr. μόνος, single, + πτερόν, a wing.] The typical genus of Monopteridæ, containing anguilliform or eel-like fishes whose fin-system is reduced to a continuous marginal membrane around the tail. M. albus is a common fish of the Indian archipelago, about 3 feet long.

monopterygian (mō-nop-tę-rij′i-ạn), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the Monopterygii, or having their characters.

II. n. A monopterygian fish.

Monopterygii (mō-nop-tę-rij′i-ī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + πτέρυξ (πτερυγ-), fin.] Fishes whose fins are reduced to one. Bloch and Schneider.

monoptote (mon′op-tōt), n. [= F. monoptote, < LL. monoptotus (in neut. pl. monoptota), < LGr. μονόπτωτος, with but one case, < Gr. μόνος, single, + πτῶσις (πτωτ-), case, < πίπτειν, fall.] In gram., a noun or an adjective having but one case-form. A monoptote may be (a) a word with only one case in use, or (b) a word with but one case-form which may be used for several or for all cases.

monopus (mon′ō-pus), n. [NL., < Gr. μονόπους, one-footed, < μόνος, single, + πούς (ποδ-) = E. foot.] In teratol., a monster having but a single foot or hind limb.

Monopyleæ (mon-ō-pil′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + πύλη, a gate.] A division of Phæodaria, containing those phæodarians which have only one pseudopodal opening: opposed to Amphipyleæ.

monopylean (mon-ō-pil′ē-ạn), a. and n. [As Monopyleæ + -an.] I. a. Having one pore or pseudopodal opening; pertaining to the Monopyleæ, or having their characters.

II. n. A monopylean radiolarian.

monopyrenous (mon″ō-pī-rē′nus), a. [= F. monopyrene, < Gr. μόνος, single, + πυρήν, the stone of a fruit.] In bot., having but one nutlet or stone.

monorchid (mo-nôr′kid), a. [< monorchis, after orchid.] Having only one testicle; exhibiting or characterized by monorchism.

monorchis (mo-nôr′kis), n.; pl. monorchides (-ki-dēz). [< Gr. μόνος, single, + ὄρχις, testicle.] An animal or a person having only one testicle.

Monorchides, as they are called, have been known to be prolific. A. S. Taylor, Medical Jurisprudence, p. 726.

monorchism (mo-nôr′kizm), n. [As monorch(is) + -ism.] The presence of only one testicle.

monorganic (mon-ôr-gan′ik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + ὄργανον, organ: see organic.] Pertaining to or affecting one organ or set of organs.

Monorhina (mon-ō-rī′nä), n. pl. [NL.: see monorhine.] A primary division of the Vertebrata, or other major group of vertebrates, represented by the Marsipobranchii (Cyclostomi or roundmouths), the lampreys and hags (Hyperotreta and Hyperoartia), in which the nasal passage is single: distinguished from all other cranial vertebrates, or Amphirhina. Also, more correctly, Monorrhina.

monorhinal (mon′ō-rī-nal), a. [< monorhine + -al.] Having the nostril single; monorhine.

monorhine (mon′ō-rin), a. and n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + ῥίς (ῥιν-), the nose.] I. a. Having but one nasal passage; single-nostriled: specifically applied to the Monorhina.

II. n. A monorhinal vertebrate, as a lamprey or a hag.

Also spelled monorrhine.

monorime, monorhyme (mon′ō-rīm), n. [= F. monorime, < Gr μόνος, single, + E. rime[2].] A composition in verse in which all the lines end with the same rime.

Monorrhina, monorrhine. More correct forms of Monorhina, monorhine.

monoschemic (mon-ō-skē′mik), a. [< Gr. μονόσχημος, of but one form, < μόνος, single, + σχῆμα, form.] In anc. pros., consisting of one form of foot throughout; containing spondees only or dactyls only: noting a variety of the dactylic hexameter. A hexameter said to contain only dactyls necessarily lacks the last syllable of the last dactyl—that is, contains five dactyls and a trochee. See isochronal.

monosemic (mon-ō-sē′mik), a. [< Gr. μονόσημος, having but one signification, < μόνος, single, + σῆμα, a sign, mark, σημεῖον, a sign, mark, unit of time, mora.] In anc. pros., consisting in or equal to a single semeion (mora or unit of time); equivalent to or constituting an ordinary or normal short; monochronous: as, a monosemic arsis; a monosemic pause. See disemic, trisemic.

monosepalous (mon-ō-sep′a-lus), a. [= F. monosépale; < Gr. μόνος, single, + NL. sepalum, sepal.] In bot., having the sepals united by their edges: more properly gamosepalous.

monosiphonous (mon-ō-sī′fo̤n-us), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + σίφων, siphon: see siphon.] Having a single siphon; not polysiphonous: applied in botany to certain of the higher algæ (Florideæ) in which the siphons or pericentral tubes are wanting. See siphon.

monosism (mō-nō′sis), n. [< Gr. μόνωσις, solitariness, separation, < μονοῦν, make single or solitary, < μόνος, single: see monad.] In bot., the isolation of an organ from the rest. Cooke, Manual.

Monosomata (mon-ō-sō′ma-tä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of monosomatus: see monosomatous.] An order of Rhizopoda, containing simple single-celled or unicellular forms, naked or capsulated, such as the families Proteidæ and Arcellidæ. They are the ordinary normal amœbiform protozoans.

monosomatous (mon-ō-som′a-tus), a. [< NL. monosomatus, < Gr. μόνος, single, + σῶμα (σωματ-), body.] Having a single body—that is, cell; unicellular, as a rhizopod.

monospasm (mon′ō-spazm), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + σπασμός, a spasm.] In pathol., spasm of a particular part, as a limb or portion of a limb.

monosperm (mon′ō-spėrm), n. [= F. monosperme = Sp. monospermo, < Gr. μόνος, single, + σπέρμα, seed: see sperm.] A plant that has only one seed.

monospermal (mon-ō-spėr′mal), a. [< monosperm + -al.] Same as monospermous.

monospermous (mon-ō-spėr′mus), a. [< monosperm + -ous.] In bot., having one seed only.

monospherical (mon-ō-sfer′i-kal), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + σφαῖρα, sphere: see spherical.] Consisting of or having a single sphere.

monospondylic (mon″ō-spon-dil′ik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + σπόνδυλος, a joint of the backbone.] Having a single centrum, as a vertebra; without intercentra, as a vertebral column; not diplospondylic or embolomerous.

monospored (mon′ō-spōrd), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + σπόρος, a seed, + -ed[2].] Same as monosporous.

monosporous (mon′ō-spōr-us), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + σπόρος, a seed.] In mycology, having but a single spore, as the hyphæ of some fungi or the ascus of Pertusaria communis.

monostachous (mō-nos′tā-kus), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + στάχυς, an ear of corn, a spike.] In bot., having a single spike.

Monostega (mō-nos′te-gä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of monostegus*: see monostegous.] A division of foraminifers.

monostegous (mō-nos′te-gus), a. [< NL. monostegus*, < Gr. μόνος, single, + στέγος, for τέγος, a roof.] Having a single covering; specifically, ★of or pertaining to the Monostega.

monostich (mon′ō-stik), n. [= F. monostique = Sp. monóstico, monostiquio = It. monostico, < LL. monostichum, monostichium, < Gr. μονόστιχος, consisting of but one verse, neut. μονόστιχον, a single verse, < μόνος, single, + στίχος, a line, verse.] A single or isolated verse; also, an epigram or a poem consisting of but one verse.

monostichous (mō-nos′ti-kus), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + στίχος, a line. Cf. monostich.] Arranged in one vertical row, rank, or series, as the flowers in the spike of some species of Gyrostachis; uniserial: opposed to distichous.

monostigmatous (mon-ō-stig′ma-tus), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + στίγμα, point, stigma: see stigma.] In bot., having only one stigma.

Monostomata (mon-ō-stō′ma-tä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of monostomatus: see monostomatous.] 1. A suborder of acalephs, or discophoran Hydrozoa: same as Monostomea.—2. A prime series or division of Metazoa, including all metazoic animals excepting the sponges or Polystomata. Huxley, Quart. Jour. Micros. Sci., 1875.

monostomatous (mon-ō-stom′a-tus), a. [< NL. monostomatus (cf. Gr. μονόστομος), < Gr. μόνος, single, + στόμα, the mouth.] Having a single mouth, pore, or stoma; of or pertaining to the Monostomata: opposed to polystomatous.

Monostomea (mon-ō-stō′mē-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μονόστομος, having a single mouth: see monostomatous.] An order of acalephs, or discophoran Hydrozoa, with single central mouth and one polypite. They are free oceanic jelly-fishes, some of them of enormous size, the disk 6 or 7 feet in diameter, and the tentacles trailing 50 feet. The leading forms are Pelagia, Cyanea, and Aurelia, each of them type of a family. Also Monostoma, Monostomæ, Monostomata, and Pelagiada.

monostomean (mon-ō-stō′mē-an), a. and n. [< Monostomea + -an.] I. a. Pertaining to the Monostomea, or having their characters.

II. n. A jelly-fish of the order Monostomea.

Monostomidæ (mon-ō-stō′mi-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Monostomum + -idæ.] A family of digeneous parasitic worms of the order Trematoda, represented by the genus Monostomum.

Monostomum (mō-nos′tō-mum), n. [NL., < Gr. μονόστομος, having a single mouth: see monostomatous.] A genus of flukes or trematoid worms, typical of the family Monostomidæ, of an oval-elongated form, with only one sucker which surrounds the mouth, a strong pharynx, and the sexual openings near the anterior end of the body. Several species of these parasites are named, as M. mutabile, which is viviparous and infests birds; M. bipartitum, from the gills of fishes; M. lentis, found in the crystalline lens of the human eye. Also called Monostoma. See cuts under cercaria.

monostrophe (mō-nos′trō-fē), n. [< LL. monostrophus, < Gr. μονόστροφος, consisting of a single kind of strophe, < μόνος, single, + στροφή, a strophe: see strophe.] In pros., a poem in which all the strophes or stanzas are of the same metrical form.

monostrophic (mon-ō-strof′ik), a. [< Gr. μονοστροφικός, < μονόστροφος, consisting of a single kind of strophe: see monostrophe.] In pros., consisting of a succession of systems or strophes all of which are of the same metrical form; of or pertaining to such a succession of systems. Monostrophic composition is a subdivision of antistrophic composition, and is opposed to composition by pericopes. Most English poems which are composed in strophes or stanzas are monostrophic (as, for instance, our ordinary ballads, short- and long-meter hymns, etc.)—composition by pericopes being limited to imitations of the Greek dramatists and lyric poets. See systematic.

monostyle[1] (mon′ō-stīl), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + E. style[1].] In arch., having the same style of architecture throughout. Oxford Glossary.

monostyle[2] (mon′ō-stīl), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + στῦλος, pillar: see style[2].] In arch., having or consisting of a single shaft: applied to medieval pillars, in contradistinction to polystyle.

monostylous (mon′ō-stī-lus), a. [As monostyle + -ous.] In bot., having only one style.

monosy (mon′ō-si), a. [NL. (Morren, 1852), < Gr. μόνωσις, singleness, < μονοῦν, make single, < μόνος, single: see monad.] In bot., an abnormal condition in which organs that are ordinarily entire, or more or less united, have become split or disunited, as when a normally entire leaf becomes lobed or partite. It includes two kinds of abnormal isolation—(a) when the separation is congenital (ademsy), and (b) when it is the result of the separation of parts previously joined (dialysis).

monosyllabic (mon″ō-si-lab′ik), a. [= F. monosyllabique = Sp. monosilábico = Pg. monosyllabico (cf. Sp. monosílabo = It. monosillabo, adj.), < L. monosyllabus, < Gr. μονοσύλλαβος, of one syllable, monosyllabic: see monosyllable.] 1. Consisting of one syllable: as, a monosyllabic word.—2. Consisting of words of one syllable: as, a monosyllabic verse.—Monosyllabic echo, an echo of such kind that separate monosyllables are distinctly heard. This requires that the reflecting surface be about 112 feet from the observer. See echo.

monosyllabically (mon″ō-si-lab′i-kal-i), adv. In monosyllables; with the use of monosyllables.

monosyllabism (mon-ō-sil′a-bizm), n. [= F. monosyllabisme; as monosyllab(le) + -ism.] 1. A predominance of monosyllables; the exclusive use of monosyllables: as, the monosyllabism of Chinese.—2. The state of being monosyllabic; the character of a monosyllable.

monosyllable (mon′ō-sil-a-bl), n. [For monosyllabe* (as syllable for syllabe*) = F. monosyllabe = Sp. monosílabo = Pg. monosyllabo = It. monosillaba, a monosyllable, < L. monosyllabus, < Gr. μονοσύλλαβος, of one syllable, < μόνος, single, + συλλαβή, syllable: see syllable.] A word of one syllable.

> She dealt in nothing but in monosyllables, as if to have spoken words of greater length would have cracked her voice. Dekker, Lanthorne and Candle-Light, i.

monosyllable (mon′ō-sil-a-bl), v. t.; pret. and pp. monosyllabled, ppr. monosyllabling. [< monosyllable, n.] To express in or reduce to one syllable. [Rare.]

> Nine tailors, if rightly spelled,
> Into one man are monosyllabled. Cleaveland.

monosyllogism (mon-ō-sil′ō-jizm), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + E. syllogism.] A syllogism viewed as an isolated and independent whole.

monosyllogistic (mon-ō-sil-ō-jis′tik), a. [< monosyllog-ism + -istic.] Consisting of a single syllogism.—Monosyllogistic proof. See proof.

monosymmetric (mon″ō-si-met′rik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + E. symmetry + -ic.] In crystal., noting that system of crystallization in which there is but one plane of symmetry, the clinodiagonal plane: same as monoclinic.

monosymmetrical (mon″ō-si-met′ri-kal), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + E. symmetric + -al.] In bot., applied to flowers or other structures which can be bisected into similar halves in only one plane: synonymous with zygomorphous.

monota (mō-nō′tä), n.; pl. monotæ (-tē). [NL., < Gr. μώνωτος for μονόνατος, one-eared, < μόνος, single, + οὖς (ὠτ-), ear, handle: see ear[1].] A one-handled vase.

Amphora with small monota beside it.
B. V. Head, Historia Numorum, p. 521.

monotelephone (mon-ō-tel′e-fōn), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + E. telephone.] A telephone adapted for transmitting or receiving a sound of definite pitch or frequency of vibration.

monotelephonic (mon-ō-tel-e-fon′ik), a. [As monotelephone + -ic.] Adapted for transmitting one note or sound of definite pitch.

monotessaron (mon-ō-tes′a-ron), n.; pl. monotessara (-rä). [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + τέσσαρες, four.] A Scriptural narrative prepared from a collation of the four evangelists; a harmony of the four gospels; a diatessaron.

monothalaman (mon-ō-thal′a-man), a. and n. [< monothalam-ous + -an.] Same as monothalamian.

Monothalamia (mon″ō-thā-lā′mi-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + θάλαμος, chamber: see thalamus.] 1. A division of reticulate amœbiform protozoans, or Foraminifera, containing those whose test is single-chambered: opposed to Polythalamia. The term does not indicate any natural division of the foraminifers. See cut under Foraminifera.—2. In conch., a division of Cephalopoda, containing those cephalopods whose shell is single-chambered, as the genus Argonauta. Lamarck.

monothalamian (mon″ō-thā-lā′mi-an), a. and n. [< Monothalamia + -an.] I. a. Single-chambered; unilocular; having but one compartment: especially applied to Foraminifera of this character, in distinction from polythalamian. See cut under Foraminifera.

II. n. An organism whose test or shell is unilocular or monothalamous: said of cephalopods, and especially of foraminifers.

★Also monothalaman.

monothalamous (mon-ō-thal′a-mus), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + θάλαμος, chamber: see thalamus.] 1. In bot., single-chambered; having but one compartment; unilocular: applied to galls upon plants, and also rarely (as by Tuckerman) to the apothecia of certain lichens.—2. In entom., having but one cavity: applied to the nests or galls of insects when they have only a single chamber.

monothecal (mon-ō-thē′kal), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + θήκη, case, receptacle: see theca.] In bot., having only one loculament or cell of the pericarp.

monotheism (mon′ō-thē-izm), n. [= F. monothéisme = Sp. monoteísmo = Pg. monotheismo =

It. monoteismo, < Gr. μόνος, single, + θεός, God: see theism.] The doctrine or belief that there is but one God.

monotheist (mon′ō-thē-ist), n. [= F. monothéiste = Sp. monoteísta, < Gr. μόνος, single, + θεός, God: see theist.] One who believes that there is but one God.

monotheistic (mon″ō-thē-is′tik), a. [< monotheist + -ic.] Of or pertaining to monotheism; of the nature of monotheism; believing in monotheism.

Monotheletic (mon″ō-the-let′ik), a. Same as Monothelitic.

Monotheletism (mon-ō-thel′e-tizm), n. Same as Monothelitism.

Closely connected with Monophysitism was Monotheletism, or the doctrine that Christ has but one will, as he has but one person. Schaff, Christ and Christianity, p. 62.

monothelious (mon-ō-thē′li-us), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + θῆλυς, female.] In zoöl., polyandrous: noting species in which several males serve to fecundate a single female.

Monothelism (mō-noth′e-lizm), n. [= F. monothélisme = Sp. monotelismo; as monothel(ite) + -ism.] Same as Monothelitism.

Monothelism was the simple and natural consequence of Monophysitism, and originated from the endeavors which the State Church made in the seventh century to conciliate the Monophysites. Schaff-Herzog, Encyc.

Monothelite (mō-noth′e-līt), n. [= F. monothélite = Sp. It. monotelita, < LL. Monothelitæ, < LGr. μονοθελῆται, the sect of the Monothelites (cf. μονοθέλητος, of one will), < Gr. μόνος, single, + θέλειν, will, > θεληγής, one who wills.] One who holds that Christ has but one will, the divine; specifically, one of a heretical sect or party in the Eastern Empire in the seventh century, which held that in Christ there are but one will (the divine will absorbing the human) and one operation or energy (ἐνέργεια).

The Church hath of old condemned Monothelites as heretics, for holding that Christ had but one will. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, v. 48.

The Monothelites, a sect who adopted in a modified form the views of the Monophysites, were condemned by the Sixth General Council in 680. Their opinions took root among the Mardaites, a people of Lebanon, who about the end of the seventh century received the name of Maronites, from Maro, their first bishop. They afterwards abjured the Monothelite heresy, and were admitted into communion with Rome in 1182. Isaac Taylor, The Alphabet, I. 292.

Monothelitic (mon″ō-the-lit′ik), a. [Also Monotheletic; < Monothelite + -ic.] Pertaining or akin to the Monothelites or their doctrine.

Monothelitism (mō-noth′e-lī-tizm), n. [= F. monothélitisme; as Monothelite + -ism.] The doctrine that in the person of Christ there are but one will and one energy or operation; opposed to the orthodox doctrine (dyothelism) that since the incarnation Christ has two distinct wills, the divine and the human, and two distinct but harmonious operations. The Monothelites argued that his will must be one, will being attached to personality. The orthodox urged that there must be two wills in him, as otherwise either the divine or the human nature would be imperfect, and cited the texts Mat. xxvi. 42; Luke xxii. 42; John v. 30, vi. 38. See Monothelite. Also Monotheletism, Monothelism.

monothetic (mon-ō-thet′ik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + θετός, verbal adj. of τιθέναι, put: see thesis.] In philos., positing or supposing a single essential element.

monotint (mon′ō-tint), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + E. tint.] Drawing, painting, printing, etc., in a single tint. Compare monochrome.

The characters are mere studies in monotint. Contemporary Rev., L. 405.

monotocous (mō-not′ō-kus), a. [< Gr. μονοτόκος, bearing but one at a time, < μόνος, single, one, + τίκτειν, τεκεῖν, bear (> τόκος, birth).] 1. In zoöl., having only one at a birth; uniparous, as the human species usually is; laying but one egg before incubating, as sundry birds.—2. In bot., bearing progeny (fruiting) only once, as in annuals or biennials: same as monocarpous. Also monotokous.

Monotoma (mō-not′ō-mạ), n. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + τομή, a cutting.] The typical genus of Monotomidæ, often referred to Lathridiidæ or Cryptophagidæ, founded by Herbst in 1793. They are of small size, superficially resemble species of Silvanus, and have the antennæ moderate, with a one-jointed club. About 25 species are known, 9 from North America, as M. americana, and the rest mainly from Europe. They are found under bark and stones and in ants' nests.

monotome (mon′ō-tōm), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + τόμος, section, volume: see tome.] Comprised in one tome or volume. [Rare.]

This translation . . . was first published in the monotome edition of Gibbon's Miscellaneous Works. F. Hall, Mod. Eng., p. 56, note.

Monotomidæ (mon-ō-tom′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Monotoma + -idæ.] A family of clavicorn Coleoptera, typified by the genus Monotoma. The dorsal segments of the abdomen are partly membranous; the ventral segments are free; the tarsi are 3-jointed; the wings are not fringed; the second joint of the tarsi is not dilated; the elytra are truncate; the first and fifth ventral segments are longer than the others; the maxillæ are bilobate; and the front coxæ are small and rounded.

monotomous† (mō-not′ō-mus), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + τέμνειν, ταμεῖν, cut.] In mineral., having cleavage distinct in only one direction.

monotone (mon′ō-tōn), n. [< Gr. μονότονος, of one and the same tone, < Gr. μόνος, single, + τόνος, tone: see tone.] 1. In rhet., a sameness of tone; the utterance of successive syllables at one unvaried pitch, with little or no inflection or cadence.—2. Monotony or sameness of style in writing or speaking.

He speaks of fearful massacres . . . in the same monotone of expression. Saturday Rev.

3. In music: (a) A single tone, without harmony or variation in pitch. (b) Recitation of words in such a tone, especially in a church service, sometimes with harmonic accompaniment and with occasional inflections or melodic variations; intoning; chanting. Monotone is a natural device for increasing the sonority of the voice, so that it may readily fill a large space, and is also thought by some to have a peculiar solemnity of effect. It is much used as an element in chanting.

4. Something spoken or written in one tone or strain.

"In Memoriam," . . . although a monotone, [is] no more monotonous than the sounds of nature, the murmur of ocean, the soughing of the mountain pines. Stedman, Vict. Poets, p. 169.

monotone (mon′ō-tōn), v. t. and i.; pret. and pp. monotoned, ppr. monotoning. [< monotone, n.] To recite in a single, unvaried tone; intone; chant. Strictly speaking, to monotone and to intone are not the same, the latter having a technical meaning in connection with Gregorian music; but in common usage they are made synonymous.

monotonic (mon-ō-ton′ik), a. [< monotone + -ic.] 1. Monotonous. [Rare.]—2. Pertaining to a monotone; uttered in a monotone; also, capable of producing but a single tone, as a drum.

The use of Monotonic Recitation is of extreme antiquity, and was probably suggested, in the first instance, as an expedient for throwing the voice to greater distances than it could be made to reach by ordinary means. Grove's Dict. Music, II. 355.

monotonical (mon-ō-ton′i-kạl), a. [< monotonic + -al.] Same as monotonic.

We should not be lulled to sleep by the length of a monotonical declamation. Chesterfield.

monotonically (mon-ō-ton′i-kạl-i), adv. In a monotonic or monotonous manner.

monotonist (mō-not′ō-nist), n. [< monotone + -ist.] One who talks or writes persistently on a single subject. Davies.

monotonous (mō-not′ō-nus), a. [= F. monotone = Sp. monótono = Pg. It. monotono, < LGr. μονότονος, of one tone, < Gr. μόνος, single, + τόνος, tone: see tone. Cf. monotone.] 1. Characterized by monotony; continued in the same tone without inflection or cadence; unvaried in tone.

Every line was perhaps uniformly recited to the same monotonous modulation with a pause in the midst. T. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, II.

Then came silence, then a voice,
Monotonous and hollow like a ghost's.
Tennyson, Guinevere.

2. Unvarying in any respect; tiresomely uniform.

When one knows that one can catch as many more [salmon] as one wishes, impatient people might find the occupation monotonous. Froude, Sketches, p. 85.

Monotonous function. (a) A function unchanged by the specified change of the independent variable; or (b) a function whose value within certain limits of the real variable, if it changes, only increases or only decreases.

monotonously (mō-not′ō-nus-li), adv. In a monotonous manner; with monotony, tiresome uniformity, or lack of variation.

monotonousness (mō-not′ō-nus-nes), n. The state or quality of being monotonous; monotony; irksome or dreary sameness.

monotony (mō-not′ō-ni), n. [= F. monotonie = Sp. monotonía = Pg. It. monotonia, < Gr. μονοτονία, sameness of tone, < μονότονος, of one and the same tone: see monotone.] 1. Uniformity of tone or sound; want of inflections of voice in speaking or reading; want of cadence or modulation; monotone.

Our earliest poets were fond of multiplying the same final sound to the most tedious monotony. T. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, I. 21.

"It is in vain longer," said my father, in the most querulous monotony imaginable, "to struggle as I have done." Sterne, Tristram Shandy, iv. 19.

2. Tiresome uniformity or lack of variation in any respect; sameness; want of variety.

At sea everything that breaks the monotony of the surrounding expanse attracts attention. Irving, Sketch-Book, p. 19.

Monotremata (mon-ō-trem′a-tạ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + τρῆμα(τ-), a perforation, hole, < τετραίνειν, √ τρα, bore, perforate.] 1. In mammal., the lowest order of the class Mammalia, containing those mammals which have a single or common opening of the genital, urinary, and digestive organs, and are oviparous. The order coincides with the subclass Ornithodelphia, and also with Prototheria and Amasta; it is divided into two suborders, Tachyglossa and Platypoda, respectively constituted by the families Tachyglossidæ (or Echidnidæ) and Ornithorhynchidæ (or Platypodidæ). There are mammary glands, but no nipples. There is a common cloaca, into which empty the sperm-ducts, oviducts, and ureters, and which also receives the feces, as in birds; and the females lay eggs like those of reptiles. The testes, like the ovaries, remain abdominal. There is a peculiar T-shaped episternum or interclavicle, and the coracoid joins the sternum, as in birds. (See cut at interclavicle.) There are no true teeth in the adults. The mammals which constitute this order are the duck-mole or duck-billed platypus, Ornithorhynchus paradoxus, and several species of so-called spiny ant-eaters, of the genera Echidna or Tachyglossus and Zaglossus or Acanthoglossus. See cuts under duckbill and Echidnidæ.

2. In conch., a division of geophilous pulmonate gastropods, having the external male and female orifices contiguous or common: opposed to Ditremata.

monotrematous (mon-ō-trem′a-tus), a. [As Monotremata + -ous.] Having a single or common opening for the genital, urinary, and digestive organs, as a mammal; pertaining to the Monotremata, or having their characters; monotreme; prototherian.

monotreme (mon′ō-trēm), a. and n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + τρῆμα, hole: see Monotremata.] I. a. Same as monotrematous: as, monotreme mammals; a monotreme egg.

II. n. A member of the Monotremata, as a duck-mole or prickly ant-eater.

monotremous (mon′ō-trē-mus), a. Same as monotrematous.

monotriglyph (mon-ō-trī′glif), n. [= F. monotriglyphe = Sp. It. monotriglifo, < L. monotriglyphus, < Gr. μόνος, single, + τριγλυφος: see triglyph.] In arch., the usual intercolumniation

Monotriglyph, Temple of Assos.—Archaic Doric. (From Report of Investigations, 1881, of Archæological Institute of America.)
a, cornice; b, frieze composed of alternating triglyphs and metopes; c, architrave or epistyle.

of the Doric order, embracing one triglyph and two metopes in the entablature immediately above it.

Monotrocha (mō-not′rō-kạ), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μονότροχος, a one-wheeled car, prop. adj., having one wheel, < μόνος, single, + τροχός, wheel.] 1. In Ehrenberg's classification, a prime division of Rotifera, containing those wheel-animalcules in which the wheel is single, continuous, and ciliated: distinguished from Sorotrocha, with compound or divided wheel. He divided them into two orders, Holotrocha and Schizotrocha, each of two families.—2. In entom., one of two great divisions of Hymenoptera, including those groups in which the trochanters have but one joint, proposed by Hartig in 1837. It comprises the superfamilies Tubulifera, Heterogyna, Fossores, Diplopteryga, and Anthophila. It is distinguished from Ditrocha, which includes the Phyllophaga, Xylophaga, and Parasitica.

monotrochal (mō-not′rō-kạl), a. [As Monotrocha + -al.] 1. Having a single ciliated band, as a larval worm: as, a monotrochal polychætous larva. Encyc. Brit., XXI. 8.—2. In entom., having a single trochanteric joint; of or pertaining to the Monotrocha.

monotrochian (mon-ō-trō′ki-an), a. and n. [As Monotrocha + -ian.] I. a. Monotrochous, as a rotifer; not sorotrochous.

II. n. A wheel-animalcule whose wheel is single and undivided; any member of the Monotrocha.

monotrochous (mō-not′rō-kus), a. [As Monotrocha + -ous.] Same as monotrochal.

Monotropa (mō-not′rō-pä), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1737), so called in allusion to the nodding flowers, which are 'turned to one side'; < Gr. μόνος, single, + τρέπειν, turn. Cf. Gr. μονότροπος, of one kind, living alone, < μόνος, single, + τρόπος, a turn, way, kind, < τρέπειν, turn.] A genus of dicotyledonous plants, the type of the family Monotropaceæ, characterized by a solitary flower with separate petals. Two species are known. M. uniflora, of North America, Japan, and the Himalayas, is the Indian-pipe, corpse-plant, or ice-plant. This plant is a root-parasite or feeds on vegetable mold; it is fleshy, white or pinkish throughout, its simple clustered stems 5 or 10 inches high, clad with small scales, the nodding flower with about ten similar sepals and petals. The pine-sap or bird's-nest, Hypopitys Hypopithys, was formerly included in this genus. See bird's-nest, 1 (b), and beech-drops.

Flowering Plant of Indian-pipe (Monotropa uniflora).
a, stamen; b, fruit.

Monotropaceæ (mon″ō-trō-pā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Lindley, 1836), < Monotropa + -aceæ.] A family of dicotyledonous sympetalous plants of the order Ericales, typified by the genus Monotropa. It is composed of leafless parasitic herbs, with a four- to six-celled superior ovary. Nine genera are known, with about 12 species, natives of woods in the north temperate zone, especially in America. They have short, scaly, unbranched stems, and no green color, but are tawny, white, or reddish. This family has been generally regarded as a tribe (which was named Monotropeæ by Dumortier, 1829) either of the Ericaceæ or of the Pyrolaceæ.

monotropic (mon-ō-trop′ik), a. [< Gr. μονότροπος, of one kind: see Monotropa.] Same as monodromic.

monotypal (mon′ō-tī-pal), a. [< monotype + -al.] Same as monotypic.

monotype (mon′ō-tīp), n. and a. [= F. monotype, < Gr. μόνος, single, + τύπος, type: see type.] I. n. 1. The only, single, or sole type, as a species single in its genus, a genus in its family, etc.; a typical representative alone of its kind.—2. A print from a metal plate on which a picture is painted, as in oil-color or printers' ink. Only one proof can be made, since the picture is transferred to the paper.

We do not remember to have seen the word monotype before, nor have we seen a public exhibition of examples of this curious combination of painting and printing; but the process, or something like it, is one well known among artists, and consists of taking off, on a sheet of wet paper, by means of a press, a transfer of a picture simply painted on a polished plate of metal. The Academy, No. 891, p. 384.

II. a. Monotypic.

monotypic (mon-ō-tip′ik), a. [< monotype + -ic.] 1. Having but one type; consisting of a single representative; represented by a monotype, as a genus of one species, a family of one genus, etc.—2. Being a monotype; alone representing a given group, as a species single in its genus.

Also monotypal and monotypical.

monotypical (mon-ō-tip′i-kal), a. [< monotypic + -al.] Same as monotypic.

monovalence (mō-nov′a-lens), n. [< monoval(t-) + -ce.] The character of being monovalent.

monovalency (mō-nov′a-len-si), n. Same as univalency.

monovalent (mō-nov′a-lent), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + L. valen(t-)s, ppr. of valere, be strong.] In chem., having a valence equal to that of hydrogen, represented by unity. Also, and more properly, called univalent.

monoxid, monoxide (mo-nok′sid, -sid or -sīd), n. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + E. oxid.] 1. An oxid containing one oxygen atom combined with two univalent atoms or one bivalent atom. Used where several oxids of the same element are to be distinguished, as carbon monoxid, CO, from carbon dioxid or carbonic acid, CO_2.

2. The first oxid of a series.

monoxyle (mō-nok′sil), n. [< Gr. μονόξυλον: see monoxylon.] Same as monoxylon. R. F. Burton, tr. Arabian Nights, IV. 168, note.

monoxylon (mō-nok′si-lon), n. [< LGr. μονόξυλον, neut. of μονόξυλος, made of a solid trunk: see monoxylous.] Anything formed from a single piece of wood: specifically, a canoe or boat made from one piece of timber.

monoxylous (mō-nok′si-lus), a. [= F. monoxyle, < L. monoxylus, < Gr. μονόξυλος, made of a solid trunk (neut. μονόξυλον, sc. πλοῖον, a boat so made), also made of wood only, < μόνος, single, only, + ξύλον, wood, a piece of wood.] Formed of a single piece of wood. Dr. Wilson.

Monozoa (mon-ō-zō′ä), n. pl. Same as Monocyttaria.

monozoan (mon-ō-zō′an), a. [As monozo(ic) + -an.] Same as monozoic or monocyttarian.

monozoic (mon-ō-zō′ik), a. [< Gr. μόνος, single, + ζῷον, an animal.] In zoöl., having a single central capsule, as a radiolarian.

Monozonia (mon-ō-zō′ni-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. μόνος, single, + ζώνη, a belt, girdle.] A division of myriapods. Brandt.

Monroe doctrine. See doctrine.

Monro's foramen. See foramen of Monro, under foramen.

mons (monz), n.; pl. montes (mon′tēz). [L., a mount.] In anat., the mons Veneris.—Mons Veneris, the mount of Venus, the prominence over the pubic symphysis of the human female, cushioned with fat and covered with hair.

Mons. An abbreviation of the French Monsieur.

monseigneur (môn-sā-nyėr′), n. [F. (= Sp. monseñor = Pg. monsenhor = It. monsignore, after F.), lit. my lord, < mon (< L. meus, acc. meum), my, + seigneur, < L. senior, elder, ML. lord: see senior, seignor, señor, etc. Cf. monsignor and monsieur.] A French title of honor, equivalent to 'my lord,' given to princes, bishops, and other dignitaries of the church or court. At different times the meaning has been considerably extended. Abbreviated Mgr.

Monseigneur, one of the great lords in power at the Court, held his fortnightly reception in his grand hotel in Paris. Dickens, Tale of Two Cities, ii. 7.

monsieur (F. pron. mė-syė′), n.; pl. messieurs (F. pron. me-syė′). [Formerly partly Anglicized as monseer, mounsieur, mounseer; = Sp. monsiur = It. monsù, < F. monsieur, OF. monsieur (also messire, mesire = It. messer, orig. 'my sir,' i. e. my lord), < mon, < L. meus, acc. meum, my, + sieur, OF. sire, etc. (> E. sir), contr. of OF. seigneur, seignour, etc., lord, lit. 'elder': see sir, sire, seignor, signor, señor, senior. Cf. monseigneur, of which monsieur is, on analysis, a contracted form.] 1. Literally, my lord; sir: the common title of courtesy in France, answering to the English Mr. Abbreviated M., Mons.; plural MM., Messrs.

For Monsieur Malvolio, let me alone with him. Shak., T. N., ii. 3. 144.

Did you ever know a Frenchman that could not take an affront? I warrant monseer knows what he is about; don't you, monseer? Miss Burney, Evelina, xxv.

2. A title given to the eldest brother of the King of France.

O! let the King, let Mounsieur and the Sover'n
That doth Nauarras Spain-wronged Scepter gouern,
Be all, by all, their Countries Fathers cleapt.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Handy-Crafts.

3. A Frenchman: vulgarly and humorously mounseer.

A shoeless soldier there a man might meet Leading his monsieur by the arms fast bound.
Drayton, Battle of Agincourt.

Now the Baron was as unlike the traditional Mounseer of English songs, plays, and satires as a man could well be. W. Collins, Lady of Glenwith Grange.

4†. A gentleman: said of a Frenchman.

There is a Frenchman his companion, one
An eminent monsieur. Shak., Cymbeline, i. 6. 65.

Monsieur de Paris, a euphemistic title given in France to the public executioner.

At the gallows and the wheel—the axe was a rarity—Monsieur [de] Paris, as it was the episcopal mode among his brother Professors of the provinces, Monsieur [d'] Orleans and the rest, to call him, presided. Dickens, Tale of Two Cities, ii. 7.

monsignor (mon-sē′nyor), n. [< It. monsignor, monsignore: see monseigneur.] In the Rom. Cath. Ch., a title conferred upon prelates, and upon the dignitaries of the papal court and household. Also, in the fuller Italian form, monsignore, plural monsignori. Abbreviated Mgr.

It seemed the whole court of Rome was there—monsignori and prelates without end. Disraeli, Lothair, lxvi.

The master of the ceremonies, Monsignor Fabei, advances up the Chapel. J. R. Shorthouse, John Inglesant, xxx.

Mons Mænalus. [NL.: L. mons, mount; Mænalus, < Gr. Μαίναλος, Μαίναλον, a range of mountains in Arcadia.] A constellation, the mountain Mænalus, formed of a few stars in the feet of Boötes. It was introduced in 1690, in a posthumous work of Hevelius. The name (that of a mountain in Arcadia) is connected with the myth of Arcas and his mother, personages identified with the Great Bear and Boötes by the Greeks. The constellation is not now admitted.

Mons Mensæ. [L., named after Table Rock at the Cape of Good Hope: mons, mount; mensæ, gen. of mensa, table.] A constellation introduced by Lacaille in 1752, between the south poles of the equator and the ecliptic. Its brightest star is of the fifth magnitude.

monsoon (mon-sōn′), n. [Formerly also monson; cf. Sw. monsoon = Dan. monsun (< E.), Sw. mousson (< F.); F. monson, monçon, now mousson = Sp. monzón = Pg. monção = It. monsone, a monsoon; with accom. Rom. term., < Malay mūsim, monsoon, season, year, = Hind. mausim, time, season, < Ar. mawsim, a time, season, < wasama, mark.] 1. A wind occurring in the alternation of the trade-winds in India and the north Indian ocean. During the half-year from April to October the regular northeast trade-winds are reversed, and, with occasional interruptions, the wind blows almost a steady gale from the southwest. In some places the change of the monsoons is attended with calms; in others with variable winds; and in others, as in China, with storms and much rain. These tempests seamen call the breaking up of the monsoon. The reversed trade-wind is termed the summer, southwest, or wet monsoon, and the trade-wind is termed the winter, northeast, or dry monsoon.

The times of seasonable windes called Monsons, wherein the ships depart from place to place in the East Indies. Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 278.

They often lose the benefit of their monsoons, and much more easily other winds, and frequently their voyage. Boyle, Works, III. 771.

The summer monsoon is a much stronger current than its winter correlative; and in India this fact is recognized in popular language, since it is often spoken of distinctively as "the monsoon," the claim of the winter monsoon to the same designation being for the moment tacitly ignored. H. F. Blanford.

2. Any of the winds that have annual alternations of direction and velocity, arising from differences of temperature between continents or islands and the surrounding ocean.

All the great monsoons are found in countries and on oceans adjacent to high mountain ranges. W. Ferrel.

On the Brazilian coast, about and to the south of the tropic, there is so much regularity in the alternation of winds, although but for a few points, that their two prevailing currents, from south-east to north-east, are often called monsoons. Fitz Roy, Weather Book, p. 145.

monsoonal (mon-sō′nal), a. [< monsoon + -al.] Of or relating to monsoons; of regular or periodical occurrence: said of winds.

monster (mon′stėr), n. and a. [< ME. monstre, mounstre, < OF. monstre, F. monstre = Sp. monstruo = Pg. monstro = It. monstro, mostro, < L. monstrum, a divine omen, esp. one indicating misfortune, an evil omen, a portent, prodigy, wonder, monster, < monere, warn: see monish. Cf. monster, v., muster, monstration, etc.] I. n. 1†. Anything extraordinary, supernatural, or wonderful; a thing to be wondered at; a prodigy.

For wende I never by possibilitee,
That swich a monstre or merveille mighte be.
Chaucer, Franklin's Tale, l. 616.

2. A fabulous animal of grotesque or chimerical figure and often of huge size, compounded of human and brute shape, or of the shapes of various brutes, as the sagittary, centaur, sphinx, mermaid, minotaur, griffin, manticore, etc.

This is some monster of the isle. . . . Four legs and two voices: a most delicate monster! Shak., Tempest, ii. 2. 94.

Then Enoch traded for himself, and bought Quaint monsters for the market of those times,
A gilded dragon, also, for the babes.
Tennyson, Enoch Arden.

3. Any very large animal; anything unusually large of its kind.

Where the wallowing monster spouted his foam-fountains in the sea. Tennyson, Lotos-Eaters, Choric Song.

4. An animal or a plant of abnormal form or structure; any living monstrosity. The deviation consists sometimes in an excess, sometimes in a deficiency, of certain organs or parts; sometimes in a general or particular malformation, and sometimes in the presence of organs or parts not belonging to the sex or species. The body of scientific doctrine or knowledge of such creatures is known as teratology.

5. A person regarded with horror because of his moral deformity, or his propensity to commit revolting or unnatural crimes.

He cannot be such a monster. Shak., Lear, i. 2. 102.

6. Something unnatural and horrible.

By heaven, he echoes me,
As if there were some monster in his thought,
Too hideous to be shewn. Shak., Othello, iii. 3. 107.

7†. An example; a pattern.

Trewly she Was hir chefe patrone of beaute
And chefe ensample of all hir werke
And mounstre.
Chaucer, Death of Blanche, l. 912.

Gila monster. [So called from the Gila river in Arizona.] A large lizard, Heloderma suspectum, of the family Helodermidæ, of clumsy figure and most repulsive aspect, notable as the only member of the order Lacertilia known to be venomous, except the very similar H. horridum, the crust-lizard, found in Mexico. The name is also given to H. horridum.— Many-headed monster. See many-headed.

II. a. Of inordinate size or numbers: as, a monster gun; a monster meeting.

monster (mon'stėr), v. t. [< monster, n.: see monster, n., and monish. Cf. muster, v.] 1. To exhibit as a monster; show or point out as something monstrous or wonderful.— 2†. To make a monster of or monstrous; exaggerate or magnify extravagantly.

Men. Pray now, sit down.
Cor. I had rather have one scratch my head i' the sun
When the alarum were struck, than idly sit
To hear my nothings monster'd. Shak., Cor., ii. 2. 81.

Monstera (mon'stę-rą), n. [NL. (Adanson, 1763); origin unknown, prob. < L. monstrum, in allusion to its strange appearance.] A genus of monocotyledonous climbing shrubs of the family Araceæ, type of the subfamily Monsteroideæ and the tribe Monstereæ, characterized by four ovules in a two-celled ovary. There are 15 species, natives of tropical America. They

a, the spadix within the spathe; b, the flower.

have large firm two-ranked leaves, often with a row of large elliptical holes. Their flowers are small, without calyx or corolla, crowded upon a spadix, with a boat-shaped spathe, often yellow. The succulent fruit of coherent berries is, in the case of the Mexican M. deliciosa, an article of food. Several species are cultivated under glass for their singular foliage.

Monstereæ (mon-stē'rę-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Engler, 1876), < Monstera + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the family Araceæ, embracing 9 genera, Monstera being the type, and about 65 species, confined to tropical regions.

monster-master† (mon'stėr-mȧs''tėr), n. A tamer of brutes. [Rare.]

This monster-master stout [Nimrod],
This Hercules, this hammer-ill.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., Babylon.

Monsteroideæ (mon-ste-roi'dē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Engler, 1887), < Monstera + -oideæ.] A subfamily of plants of the family Araceæ. It embraces the tribes Monstereæ and Spathiphylleæ, with 11 genera, Monstera being the type, and about 84 species.

monstership (mon'stėr-ship), n. [< monster + -ship.] The state of being a monster: in the quotation used humorously as a title.

Cash. It [humor] is a gentleman-like monster. . . .
Cob. I'll none on it; humour, avaunt, I know you not, begone. Let who will make hungry meals for your monster-ship, it shall not be I. B. Jonson, Every Man [in his Humour, iii. 2.

monstrance (mon'strans), n. [< OF. monstrance = It. mostranza, < ML. monstrantia, a monstrance, < L. monstran(t-)s, ppr. of monstrare, show: see monster, v., monstration, and cf. mustrance.] In the Rom. Cath. Ch., originally, any receptacle in which sacred relics were held up to view; after the fourteenth century, restricted to the transparent or glass-faced shrine in which the consecrated host is presented for the adoration of the people, either while being carried in procession or when exposed on the altar. It is placed in a stand, generally made of precious metal, and sometimes richly jeweled. See lunette, 11. Also called expositorium, ostensory, remonstrance, and theotheca.

Monstrance.—French work of the end of the 14th century. (From "L'Art pour Tous.") monstration (mon-strā'shọn), n. [< L. monstratio(n-), a showing, < monstrare, pp. monstratus, show, point out, indicate, ordain, indict, also advise: see monster, v.] A showing; demonstration; proof.

The blood burst incontinent out of the nose of the dead king at the comming of his sonne, geuing thereby as a certaine monstracion howe he was the author of his death.
Grafton, Hen. II., an. 33.

monstrator (mon'strā-tọr), n. [< L. monstrator, < monstrare, pp. monstratus, show: see monstration.] An exhibitor; a demonstrator. [Rare.]

monstricide (mon'stri-sīd), n. [< L. monstrum, a monster, + -cidium, < cædere, kill.] The slaughter of a monster. [Humorous.]

If Perseus had cut the latter's cruel head off, he would have committed not unjustifiable monstricide.
Thackeray, Virginians, xxv.

monstriferous† (mon-strif'e-rus), a. [< L. monstrifer, monster-bearing, < monstrum, a monster, + ferre = E. bear[1].] Producing monsters.

This monstriferouse empire of women . . . is most detestable and damnable. Knox, First Blast, Pref., p. 5.

monstrosity (mon-stros'i-ti), n.; pl. monstrosities (-tiz). [Also formerly monstruosity; < F. monstruosité = Sp. monstruosidad = Pg. monstruosidade = It. mostruosità, mostrosità, < LL. monstrosita(t-)s, monstruosita(t-)s, monstrousness, < monstrosus, monstruosus, monstrous: see monstrous.] 1. The state or character of being monstrous, or formed out of the common order of nature; the character of being shocking or horrible.

This is the monstruosity in love, lady — that the will is infinite, and the execution confined.
Shak., T. and C., iii. 2. 87.

In either case, it is a deviation from the normal type, and, as such, is analogous to the monstrosities, both of animals and of vegetables.
Buckle, Civilization, II. vi. (Latham.)

At long intervals of time, out of millions of individuals reared in the same country and fed on nearly the same food, deviations of structure so strongly pronounced as to deserve to be called monstrosities arise; but monstrosities cannot be separated by any distinct line from slighter variations. Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 23.

2. An unnatural production; a monster.

monstrous (mon'strus), a. [Formerly also monstruous, < F. monstrueux = Sp. Pg. monstruoso = It. monstruoso, mostruoso, < LL. monstruosus, monstrosus, preternatural, strange, < L. monstrum, a portent, monster: see monster.] 1. Of unnatural formation; deviating greatly from the natural form or structure; out of the common course of nature: as, a monstrous birth or production.

His Diadem was neither brass nor rust,
But monstrous metal of them both begot.
J. Beaumont, Psyche, i. 15.

In monstrous plants we often get direct evidence of the possibility of one organ being transformed into another.
Darwin, Origin of Species, p. 392.

2. Enormous; huge; prodigious; unparalleled.

And euen whole families of these monstrous men are found at this day in America, both neere to Virginia, as Captain Smith reporteth, and . . . about the Straits of Magellan, neere which he found Giants.

monstrous (mon'strus), adv. [< monstrous, a.] Exceedingly; extremely; wonderfully: as, monstrous difficult. [Now vulgar or colloquial.]

An I may hide my face, let me play Thisby too: I'll speak in a monstrous little voice. Shak., M. N. D., i. 2. 54.

You are angry,
Monstrous angry now, grievously angry.
Fletcher, Wildgoose Chase, iii. 1.

It is such monstrous rainy weather that there is no doing with it. Swift, Journal to Stella, x.

monstrously (mon'strus-li), adv. In a monstrous manner. (a) In a manner out of the common order of nature; hence, shockingly; hideously; horribly: as, a man monstrously wicked.

They melted down their stoln ear-rings into a calf, and monstrously cryed out: These are thy gods, O Israel!
Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., i. 2.

(b) Exceedingly; inordinately; enormously.

These truths with his example you disprove,
Who with his wife is monstrously in love.
Dryden, tr. of Juvenal's Satires, vi.

monstrousness (mon'strus-nes), n. The state or quality of being monstrous, in any sense of that word; especially, enormity; exceeding wickedness.

The statelinesse of the buildinges and the monstrousenesse of the sepulchres.
Guevara, Letters (tr. by Hellowes, 1577), p. 29.

O, see the monstrousness of man
When he looks out in an ungrateful shape!
Shak., T. of A., iii. 2. 79.

monstruosity†, monstruous†, etc. Obsolete forms of monstrosity, etc.

Montacuta (mon-ta-kū'tą), n. [NL. (Turton, 1819), named after George Montagu, an English naturalist (died 1815); later also Montagua.] A genus of bivalve mollusks referred either to the family Kelliidæ or to the family Erycinidæ, or made type of the Montacutidæ. The shell is oblique, with the cartilage in a pit between two strong teeth, and there is no anterior tube. M. ferruginea is a small shell found on the northern coast of Europe.

Montacutidæ (mon-ta-kū'ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Montacuta + -idæ.] A family of bivalves named from the genus Montacuta, now generally merged in Erycinidæ.

montagnard (mȯn-ta-nyȧr'), n. [F., < montagne, mountain: see mountain.] 1. A mountaineer. —2. [cap.] One of the extreme democratic party in the legislatures of the first French revolution; hence, in general, a member of the radical or extreme liberal party. montaine†, n. A Middle English form of mountain.

montaña (mon-tän'yą), n. [Sp.: see mountain.] See monte, 1.

In the Peruvian Andes "montaña" has a peculiar meaning. It is the densely forested region on the eastern slope of the range, this country being divided into three longitudinal belts — the "Coast," "Sierra," and "Montaña," the "Sierra" being the region of the Andes proper.
J. D. Whitney, Names and Places, p. 99.

montance†, n. A Middle English form of mountance.

montane (mon'tān), a. [= F. montane, OF. montain = Sp. Pg. It. montano, < L. montanus, belonging to a mountain: see mountain.] Mountainous; belonging or relating to mountains: as, a montane fauna.

montanic (mon-tan'ik), a. [< montane + -ic.] Pertaining to mountains; consisting of mountains.

Montanism (mon'tā-nizm), n. [< Montanus (see def.) + -ism.] The tenets of a sect of the Christian church, now extinct, founded during the second century by Montanus of Phrygia. The Montanists believed in the divine and prophetic inspiration of Montanus, the continuance of the miraculous gifts of the apostolic church, the immediate approach of the second advent of Christ, and the establishment of the heavenly Jerusalem at Pepuza in Phrygia; they practised rigorous asceticism.

All the ascetic, rigorous, and chiliastic elements of the ancient church combined in Montanism.
Schaff, Hist. Christian Church, II. 417.

Montanist (mon'tā-nist), n. [< LGr. Μοντανιστής, a follower of Montanus, < Μοντανός, LL. Montanus: see Montanism.] A believer in the tenets of Montanism.

These zealots hailed the appearance of the Paraclete in Phrygia, and surrendered themselves to his guidance. In so doing, however, they had to withdraw from the church, to be known as Montanists, or "Kataphrygians," and thus to assume the character of a sect. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 775.

Montanistic (mon-tā-nis'tik), a. [< Montanist + -ic.] Pertaining to the doctrines, customs, or character of the Montanists.

'Slid! an these be your tricks, your passados, and your montantos, I'll none of them.
B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour, iv. 5.

mont-de-piété (môn'dė-pē-ā-tā'), n. [F., = Sp. monte de piedad, < It. monte di pietà, lit. 'fund of pity' (cf. equiv. Sp. monte pío, 'pious fund'), < L. mon(t-)s, hill, heap, ML. also pile of money, fund, bank; de, of; pieta(t-)s, piety, ML. compassion, pity: see *mount*1, *de*2, piety, pity.] An institution established by public authority for lending money on the pledge of goods, at a reasonable rate of interest. These establishments originated in Italy in the fifteenth century, the object in founding them being to countervail the exorbitantly usurious practices of the Jews. The funds, together with suitable warehouses and other accommodations, are managed by directors, and the goods pledged are sold if the money lent on them is not returned by the proper time.

monte (mon'te), n. [< Sp. monte, a hill, mountain, wood, heap, a gambling-game, < L. mons (mont-), a hill, mountain: see *mount*1.] 1. A tract more or less thickly covered with shrubby vegetation or scanty forests; a forest. In South America, and especially in the northern part, the word monte is used to designate more or less scantily forested regions or narrow belts of forest vegetation, while montaña is applied to broad, densely foreste l areas. In Mexico and California monte more generally has the signification of 'forest.'

Less than a league above there is [in New Granada] a spot destitute of trees. All such are called llano—plain—whether they be flat or hilly; and all land covered with thicket is called monte if it be but a few miles through, and montaña if more. I. F. Holton, New Granada, p. 436.

The montes of South and Central Uruguay form narrow fringes to the larger streams, and rarely exceed a few hundred yards in width. Seen from distant higher ground, they resemble rivers of verdure meandering through the bare campos, from which they are sharply defined—the reason being that the wood only grows where it is liable to inundation. Encyc. Brit., IX. 406.

2. A favorite Spanish and Spanish-American gambling-game, played with the Spanish pack of forty cards. The players bet on certain cards of a layout, and win or lose according as others drawn from the pack do or do not match with these. Monte was the most popular of the gambling-games of California in the early times of the gold discoveries.—Three-card monte, a gambling-game, of Mexican origin, played with three cards, of which one is usually a court-card. By skilful manipulation, the cards are so thrown on the table, face down, as to deceive the eye of the manipulator's opponent, who bets on the position of one of the cards, usually the court-card.

monte-bank (mon'te-bangk), n. A gaming-table or an establishment where monte is played; also, the bank or pile of money usually placed in front of the dealer, and used in paying the stakes.

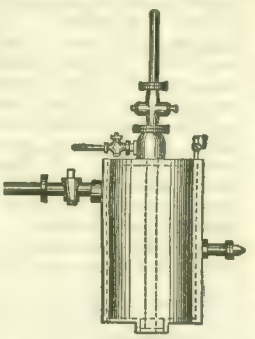
Monteith.



movable rim, and decorated with flutings and a scalloped edge. It was also used for cooling and carrying wine-glasses.

New things produce new words, and thus Monteith Has by one Vessel sav'd his name from Death.
Quoted in Ashton's Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, [I. 183.

Silver cisterns could not have been common or often put to the baser use [rinsing forks and spoons during dinner]; but when they were discarded from the table, the more interesting monteith, with its movable rim, tall punch-glasses, lemon-strainer, and ladle, took their place. N. and Q., 7th ser., VII. 250.

2. [Appar. of different origin from the above, but from the same surname.] A kind of cotton handkerchief having white spots on a colored ground, the spots being produced by a chemical which discharges the color. Dict. Needlework.

monte-jus (F. pron. môṅt'zhü), n. [F., < monter, raise, + jus, juice: see *mount*2, v., and juice.] In sugar-manuf., a force-pump by which the juice from the cane-mill is raised to the clarifiers on a story above. It consists of a vessel with a well sunk in the bottom and having three valved pipes, one by which the juice is received, another by which it is discharged, and a third by which steam is admitted. The steam, entering above the surface of the juice, forces it up through the delivery-pipe to the clarifiers. The steam then condenses, and leaves a vacuum, and the operation of alternately filling and ejecting continues. E. H. Knight.

Monte-jus.

montem (mon'tem), n. [Short for L. processus ad montem, going to the hill: processus, a going forward, orig. pp. of procedere, go forward (see proceed); ad, to, toward; montem, acc. of mons, a hill, mount: see *mount*1.] The name given to an ancient English custom, prevalent among the scholars of Eton till 1847, which consisted in their proceeding every third year on Whit-Tuesday to a tumulus or mound near the Bath road, and exacting "money for salt," as it was called, from all persons present, or passers-by. The sum so collected was given to the captain, or senior scholar, and was intended to assist in defraying the expenses of his residence at the university. The "salt-money" has been known to reach nearly £1,000.

Montenegrin, Montenegrine (mon-te-neg'rin), a. and n. [< Montenegro (see def.), an It. translation of Serv. Crna Gora, Black Mountain (Serv. crn, black, gora, mountain); < monte, < L. mons (mont-), mountain, + negro, nero, < L. niger, black: see *mount*1 and negro.] I. a. Relating to Montenegro, a small country of Europe, east of the Adriatic, nearly surrounded by Austrian and Turkish territory, or to its inhabitants.

There are, besides, other periods of the moon which are termed months by astronomers. These are—(a) The anomalistic month, or mean period of the revolution of the moon from one perigee to the next: it is 27 days, 13 hours, 18 minutes, 37.4 seconds. (b) The sidereal month, or mean period required by the moon to make a circuit among the stars: it is 27 days, 7 hours, 43 minutes, 11.5 seconds. (c) The tropical month, or the mean period of the moon's passing through 360 degrees of longitude, as from one vernal equinox to the next: it differs from the sidereal month only by an amount corresponding to the monthly precession of the equinoxes, and is 27 days, 7 hours, 43 minutes, 4.7 seconds. (d) The nodical or dracontic month, which is the mean time between two successive passages by the moon through its rising node: it is 27 days, 5 hours, 5 minutes, and 36 seconds.

2. One twelfth part of a tropical year, or 30 days, 10 hours, 29 minutes, 3.8 seconds: called specifically a solar month.—3. One of the twelve parts into which the calendar year is arbitrarily divided: called specifically a calendar month. The calendar months are January, 31 days; February, 28 (except in leap-year, when it has 29); March, 31; April, 30; May, 31; June, 30; July, 31; August, 31; September, 30; October, 31; November, 30; December, 31.

4. At common law and in equity, month has been understood to mean 'a lunar month,' which is assumed to be 28 days, except when the contrary appears, and except when used of mercantile transactions, such as negotiable paper, etc. In ecclesiastical law, and now in all cases throughout the United States generally, its legal meaning is 'a calendar month,' except when the contrary appears. For the purpose of calculating interest, a month is generally considered the twelfth part of a year, and as equivalent to 30 days.

mood[1] (möd), n. [< ME. mood, mode, mod, < AS. mōd, mind, heart, soul, spirit, courage, pride, haughtiness, magnificence, zeal, = OS. mōd, muod = OFries. mōd = D. moed = MLG. mōt, moit, mout, mūt, LG. mōt, mūt, mind, heart, courage, = OHG. muot, MHG. muot, sense, spirit, G. mut, muth, courage, = Icel. mōdhr, wrath, grief, moodiness, = Sw. Dan. mod, courage, = Goth. mōds, wrath; orig. appar. any strong or excited state of feeling; perhaps, with formative -d, from a root appearing in Gr. μαίεσθαι, endeavor, seek, whence prob. μοῦσα, muse: see Muse[2].] 1†. Mind; heart.

This is his wyll after Moyses lawe,
That ye shulde bryng your beistes good,
And offer theme here your God to knawe,
And frome your synns to turne your moode.
York Plays, p. 434.

2. Temper of mind; state of the mind as regards passion or feeling; disposition; humor: as, a melancholy mood.

When Fortune, in her shift and change of mood, Spurns down her late beloved. Shak., T. of A., i. 1. 85.

Every landscape fair,
As fit for every mood of mind,
Or gay, or grave, or sweet, or stern, was there.
Tennyson, Palace of Art.

By mental moods is ordinarily understood those collective conditions of the mind which are characterized by some fundamental tone, but without any special feelings accompanied by clear consciousness of their inducing causes. G. T. Ladd, Physiol. Psychology, p. 520.

3†. Heat of temper; anger.

Atte laste aslaked was his mood.
Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 902.

Who, in my mood, I stabb'd unto the heart.
Shak., T. G. of V., iv. 1. 51.

4†. Zeal: in the phrase with main and mood, with might and main; with a will.

Saint Elyne than was wunder fayne . . .
That ilk figure of the rode Honured thai with mayn and mode.
Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 88.

5. A morbid or fantastic state of mind, as a fit of bad temper, sudden anger, or sullenness; also, absence of mind, or abstraction: generally used in the plural.

Then turn'd Sir Torre, and, being in his moods, Left them. Tennyson, Lancelot and Elaine.

6. A state of mind with reference to something to be done or omitted; a more or less capricious state of feeling disposing one to action: commonly in the phrase in the mood: as, many artists work only when they are in the mood.

It should be remembered that the motive power always becomes sluggish in men who too easily admit the supremacy of moods. Lowell, New Princeton Rev., I. 167.

mood[2] (möd), n. [A later form of mode[1], which is preferable in both the grammatical and logical uses, though not usual in the latter: see mode[1].] 1. In gram., same as mode[1], 3.

The mood is an affection of the verb serving the varietie of utterance. A. Hume, Orthographie (E. E. T. S.), p. 30.

2. In logic, a variety of syllogism depending on the quantity (universal or particular) and quality (affirmative or negative) of the propositions composing it. In the traditional logic the names of the moods (invented by Petrus Hispanus) are—First figure, Bārbārā, Cēlārent, Dārii, Ferīō, Bārālipton, Cēlantēs, Dābitīs, Fāpesmō, Frisēsōmōrum; Second figure, Cēsārē, Cāmestres, Festīnō, Bārōcō; Third figure, Dāraptī, Fēlapton, Disāmis, Dātisī, Bōcardō, Ferīson. These names are merely mnemonic, and many of their letters are significant. The vowel a denotes a universal affirmative proposition, e the universal negative, i the particular affirmative, and o the particular negative. By the first syllable is indicated the major premise, by the second the minor, and by the third the conclusion. For example, the name Barbara shows that the first mood of the first figure consists of two universal affirmative premises leading to a universal affirmative conclusion. The same understanding is to be had in regard to the vowels of the other words. Certain of the consonants also are significant. Thus, all indirect moods designated by a word beginning with b should be reduced to Barbara, the first mood of the first figure; all that are designated by a word beginning with c, to the second mood, Celarent; all in d to Darii, the third; and all in f to Ferio, the fourth. Other letters indicate how to reduce indirect to direct moods: thus s signifies that the proposition denoted by the vowel immediately preceding is to be simply converted in the reduction; p, that the proposition denoted by the vowel immediately preceding should be converted per accidens; m, that the premises should be transposed—that is, the major should be made the minor, and conversely; and c, that the mood designated by the word in which it occurs should be reduced per impossibile: whence the verses:

Simpliciter vult s verti, p vero per acci;
M vult transponi, c per impossibile duci.
Servat majorem, variatque secunda minorem;
Tertia majorem variat, servatque minorem.

A moode is a lawful placing of propositions in their dewe qualitie or quantitie. Sir T. Wilson, Art of Logic, fol. 26.

3. In music, same as mode[1], 7.

Anon they move
In perfect phalanx to the Dorian mood
Of flutes and soft recorders; such as raised
To highth of noblest temper heroes old Arming to battel. Milton, P. L., i. 550.

Indirect or inverse mood, a mood of indirect syllogism. See indirect.

moody (mö'di), a. [< ME. moody, mody, modi, < AS. mōdig (= OS. mōdag, mōdeg, mōdig = D. moedig = OHG. muotīg (only in comp.), MHG. muotic, G. mutig = Icel. mōdhugr = Sw. Dan. modig = Goth. mōdags), angry, < mōd, mood, temper: see mood[1].] 1†. Spirited; high-spirited; proud; obstinate.

Hof on ich herde saie,
Ful modi mon and proud.
MS. Digby 86, f. 165. (Halliwell.)

2†. Angry.

When, like a lion thirsting bloud,
Did moody Richard range
And made large slaughters where he went.
Warner, Albion's England, vii. 33.

3. Subject to or indulging in moods or humors; hence, peevish; fretful; out of humor; gloomy; sullen; melancholy.

Sweet recreation barr'd, what doth ensue
But moody and dull melancholy?
Shak., C. of E., v. 1. 79.

In a moody humour wait,
While my less dainty comrades bait.
Cowper, tr. of Horace's Satires, i. 5.

Moody madness laughing wild Amid severest woe.
Gray, Ode on Prospect of Eton College.

4†. Corresponding or adapted to moods or varying states of mind. [Rare.]

Give me some music—music, moody food
Of us that trade in love. Shak., A. and C., ii. 5. 1.

mool (möl), n. A dialectal variant of mold[1].

By worms they're eaten, in mools they're rotten.
Clerk Saunders (Child's Ballads), II. 324.

Or worthy friends rak'd in the mools,
Sad sight to see! Burns, To the Toothache.

moolah, moollah (mül'ä), n. Same as molla.

moolbery†, n. A Middle English form of mulberry.

Moolid (mö'lid), n. [< Ar. maulid, nativity, esp. the nativity of Mohammed.] An Egyptian festival in celebration of the birth of Mohammed and the dawn of Islamism; a birthday.

I have now a cluster of lamps hanging before my door, in honour of the moo'lid of a sheykh who is buried near the house in which I am living.
E. W. Lane, Modern Egyptians, I. 307.

mooly, mooley (mül'i), a. and n. See muley.

moon[1] (mön), n. [< ME. moone, mone, < AS. ★mōna = OS. māno = OFries. mōna = MD. maene, D. maan = MLG. māne, mān, LG. maan = OHG. māno, MHG. māne, mōn, also (with excrescent t, due prob. in part to association with mānet, month) mānte, mānde, G. mond = Icel. māni = Sw. måne = Dan. maane = Goth. mēna (all masc.), the moon; = Gr. μήνη, the moon, = Lith. menů, the moon; cf., with appar. formative s, OBulg. miesetsĭ, etc., moon, month, L. mensis, month, Gr. μήν (for μηνς*), month (Μήν, the Moon-god, L. Lunus, Μήνη, the Moon-goddess, L. Luna), Skt. mās (for māns*, mēns*) = Zend mās, > Pers. māh (> Hind. Turk. māh), moon, month. The relations of these forms to each other, and to the words for 'month' (see month), and their ult. root, are undetermined. The usual explanation is that the moon is the 'measurer' (sc. of time), < √ ma, Skt. mā, measure (whence ult. E. mete[1] and measure). The L. name of the moon (luna) and the L., Gr., and Teut. names for the sun (L. sōl = AS. sōl, etc.; Gr. ἥλιος; AS. sunne, E. sun, etc.) come from other roots, meaning 'shine.'] 1. A heavenly body which revolves around the earth monthly, accompanying the earth as a satellite in its annual revolution, and shining by the sun's reflected light. Next to the sun, the moon is the most conspicuous and interesting of celestial objects. The rapidity of its motion, the variety of its phases, and especially the striking phenomena of eclipses, compelled the attention of the earliest observers; and the fact that lunar observations can be made available to determine the longitude has given the theory of the moon's motion the first rank in economic importance, while the mathematical problems involved have proved most interesting and fertile from the scientific point of view. Of all the heavenly bodies (meteors excepted) the moon is nearest to us. Its mean distance is a little more than sixty times the radius of the earth, or 238,800 miles. The dimensions of the moon as compared with those of the earth are far greater than those of any other satellite in proportion to its primary. Its diameter is 2,162 miles (about 0.273 of the earth's equatorial diameter), and its volume, or bulk, is 0.0204, or about one forty-ninth of that of the earth. Its mean density, however (about 3.4 times that of water), is only about three fifths of that of the earth, and its mass about one eightieth. The inclination of its orbit to the ecliptic is 5°.8′ 40″. It completes its revolution around the earth in an average period of 27d. 7h. 43m. 11.5s., which constitutes the sidereal month; the ordinary, or synodical, month, from new moon to new moon again, is a little more than two days longer—29d. 12h. 44m. 2.7s. (See month.) The moon's orbital motion is subject to considerable inequalities, due to the disturbing action of the sun, and the investigation of these inequalities makes up the major part of the "lunar theory." The moon revolves on its axis once in a sidereal month, thus always presenting nearly the same face to the earth—a circumstance which has led to the fallacy of a denial of its rotation. (See rotation.) Its disk appears to the naked eye diversified by dark and bright patches, giving rise to the "man in the moon" of popular fancy (see under man); but on examination with a powerful telescope these are lost sight of, and replaced by a crowd of interesting objects, such as mountains and valleys, craters and clefts, on a scale unknown upon the earth: the surface-structure seems to be mainly volcanic, resembling very closely in certain respects, and differing most markedly in others from, that which is characteristic of volcanic regions on the earth's surface. The moon has no clouds, shows no certain indications of an atmosphere or of the presence of water, and is believed to have a mean temperature extremely low, with a wide range on the illuminated hemisphere. See the supplement.

moon-culminating (mön′kul″mi-nā-ting), a. In astron., passing the meridian at nearly the same time and on nearly the same parallel of declination as the moon.—Moon-culminating stars, stars which culminate at about the same time and nearly on the same parallel of declination as the moon. They are the stars of which the places are given in the Nautical Almanac (generally four in number for each day) for the days on which the moon can be observed, for use in longitude determinations.

moon-culminations (mön′kul-mi-nā″shonz), n. pl. In astron., a method of determining the longitude of a place by observing with a transit-instrument the times at which the limb of the moon and certain stars in the same part of the sky culminate, or cross the meridian. The fundamental principle is essentially the same as that involved in the nautical method of "lunar distances." Among the stars the moon's position is utilized to make known the Greenwich time—but the transit observations are more easy and accurate than those made with a sextant, and the reductions are more simple. The method has been entirely superseded by the telegraphic method wherever circumstances render the latter practicable.

moon-daisy (mön′dā″zi), n. The oxeye daisy, Chrysanthemum Leucanthemum.

Broad moon-daisies among the ripe and almost sapless grass of midsummer. The Century, XXXVI. 804.

Moorish[2] (mör'ish), a. [< Moor[4] + -ish[1]. Cf. Morisco, Moresque, morris[1].] Of or pertaining to the Moors.—Moorish art, decoration, etc., the art of the Mohammedan people of northern Africa both at home and in Spain during their occupation of that country. It is a branch of the Saracenic art, and bears a close general resemblance to Arabic art, as seen in Syria, and especially in Egypt, but is generally inferior in dignity, refinement, and variety. Like other Saracenic art, it is nearly devoid of the representation of animal or vegetable life, and is especially rich in purely conventional or geometrical patterns, such as interlacings, produced in stamped and colored plaster, in glazed and painted tiles, in carving, etc. Alhambraic art is a late development of the Moorish. See cut under arabesque.—Moorish drum, a tambourine.—Moorish pottery, pottery made by the people of northern Africa: a name specifically given to the bacini built into the walls of ancient Italian churches, assumed by modern writers to have been brought from Africa as trophies.

Moorish Art.—Doorway of Mosque, Tangiers, Morocco.

moos †, n. An old form of moose.

moose (mös), n. [Formerly also moosis; < Algonkian, in various dialects, moos, mos, mus, etc.; 'he strips off.'] An animal of the family Cervidæ, the Cervus alces or Alces machlis of those who hold that it is the same as the elk of Europe; the moose-deer of America, by most considered specifically distinct from the elk of Europe, and then called Alces americanus. It is the largest animal of its kind in America, and corresponds to the elk of Europe, being very different from the American elk or wapiti, Elaphus (Cervus) canadensis. The male may attain the height of 17 hands, and weigh 1,000 pounds or more. The form is very ungainly, with humped withers and sloping quarters, and a very heavy, unshapely head. The horns are enormous and completely palmate, with many short points. A kind of bag or pouch hangs from the throat. The limbs are thick, with broad hoofs; the tail is very short; the ears are large and slouching; and the muzzle is very broad, with a thick pendulous upper lip. The color is brown of variable shade. The female is hornless, and much smaller and more slightly built than the male. The moose inhabits the northernmost part of the United States, as northern New England, and much of British America. Alces gigas is found in Alaska.

Moose (Alces machlis).

moosewood (mös'wûd), n. 1. The leatherwood, Dirca palustris.—2. The striped maple, Acer Pennsylvanicum. See maple[1].

moose-yard (mös'yärd), n. A space or area in the woods occupied by a herd of moose in winter, shut in on all sides by deep snow. The snow where the animals herd together to browse upon moosewood, moss, etc., being trampled down, a sort of inclosure is formed, which may be occupied by many individuals as long as the supply of food lasts. [U. S. and Canada.]

Mooslim, n. and a. Same as Moslem.

moost†, a. A Middle English form of most.

moot[1] (möt), n. [< ME. moot, mote, mot, imot, < AS. mōt (found only in comp.), usually gemōt, meeting, assembly (witena gemōt, assembly of counselors, parliament: see witena-gemot), = OS. mōt, muot = MLG. mote, mute, LG. mote = MHG. muoz = Icel. mōt = Goth. gamōt* (in deriv. gamōtjan, meet), a meeting (cf. Sw. möte, Dan. möde = E. meet, n.). Hence moot[1], v., and meet[1].] 1†. A meeting; a formal assembly. In this sense obsolete, except as used, chiefly in the archaic (Middle English) form mote, in certain historical terms, as folkmoot or folkmote, hallmote, etc. See def. 3.

> The monke was going to London ward,
> There to holde grete mote.
> Lytell Geste of Robyn Hode (Child's Ballads, V. 88).

2. The place of such a meeting.—3. In early Eng. hist., a court formed by assembling the men of the village or tun, the hundred, or the kingdom, or their representatives. It exercised political and administrative functions with some judicial powers. Compare witena-gemot. See the quotation.

> The four or ten villagers who followed the reeve of each township to the general muster of the hundred were held to represent the whole body of the township from whence they came. Their voice was its voice, their doing its doing, their pledge its pledge. The hundred-moot, a moot which was made by this gathering of the representatives of the townships that lay within its bounds, thus became at once a court of appeal from the moots of each separate village as well as of arbitration in dispute between township and township. The judgment of graver crimes, and of life or death, fell to its share; while it necessarily possessed the same right of law-making for the hundred that the village-moot possessed for each separate village. And as hundred-moot stood above town-moot, so above the hundred-moot stood the Folk-moot, the general muster of the people in arms, at once war-host and highest law-court, and general Parliament of the tribe. But whether in Folk-moot or hundred-moot, the principle of representation was preserved. In both the constitutional forms, the forms of deliberation and decision, were the same. In each the priests proclaimed silence, the ealdormen of higher blood spoke, groups of freemen from each township stood round, shaking their spears in assent, clashing shields in applause, settling matters in the end by loud shouts of "Aye" or "Nay." J. R. Green, Hist. of Eng. People, I. i.

4. Dispute; debate; discussion; specifically, in law, an argument on a hypothetical case by way of practice.

> The pleadynge used in courte and chauncery called motes, where . . . a case is appoynted to be moted by certayne yonge men, contaynyng some doubtefull controuersie. Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, i. 14.

> I hard that your Grace, in the disputes of al purposes quherwith, after the exemple of the wyse in former ages, you use to season your moat.
> A. Hume, Orthographie (E. E. T. S.), Ded., p. 2.

> Orators have their declamations; lawyers have their moots. Bacon, Church of Eng.

Mark moot. See mark[1].—Swain moot or mote, in old Eng. law, a court of the forests, held periodically before the verderers, and having jurisdiction of poaching, etc. Sometimes written swan moot.—Wood moot or mote, in old Eng. forest law, an inferior court held every forty days, a sort of minor "regard" or inspection, in which presentments were made and attachments received. Stubbs.

moot[1] (möt), a. [As an adj., to be regarded as contracted from mooted. Moquilea (mō-kwil′ē-ä), n. [NL. (Aublet, 1775); from a native name in Guiana.] A genus of rosaceous trees of the tribe Chrysobalaneæ, distinguished by small anthers, stamens much longer than the flower, and a single ovary immersed in the base of the calyx-tube. About 20 species are known, natives of northern South America and Central America. They have rigid alternate leaves, and small flowers variously clustered, usually without petals. See caraipi. Included in Licania by some authors.

-mor, -more[2], a. [Gael. and Ir. mor, great.] A Celtic adjective, meaning 'great,' used as a component in personal and place names: as, Can-★more, 'great head,' Strath*more*, 'great strath.'

mora[1] (mō′rä), n.; pl. moræ (-rē). [L., delay; hence ult. moration, demur.] 1. In anc. pros., the unit of time, equivalent to the ordinary or normal short; the semeion or primary time. See time.—2. In civil law, any unjustifiable delay in the fulfilment of an obligation, for which the party delaying is responsible. It may be either on the side of the debtor who refuses to fulfil or on that of the creditor who refuses to accept. In the first case it gives rise to an action for damages, in the latter case the debtor is discharged of liability for the loss of the thing.

mora[2] (mō′rä), n. [It., appar. a particular use of mora, delay, < L. mora, delay: see mora[1].] An old game still common in Italy, in which one of the players, after raising the right hand, suddenly lowers it, with one or more of the fingers extended, the other players trying to guess the number so extended.

mora[3] (mō′rä), n. [Tupi moira tinga, white tree.] A leguminous tree, Dimorphandra (Mora) excelsa, found in Guiana and Trinidad. Its hard tough wood is much esteemed for ship-building, and is also fitted for cabinet-work by its susceptibility of polish and its sometimes figured grain.

Moræa (mō-rē′ä), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1762), named after Johannes Moræus, father-in-law of Linnæus.] A genus of plants of the family Iridaceæ, type of the tribe Moræeæ. It is distinguished by the petaloid winged branches of the style, and by the perianth being completely divided to its base. About 60 species are known, natives of tropical and southern Africa, Australia, and the Mascarene Islands. They are bulbous plants or grow from a short rootstock, with long narrow upright leaves, and several or many handsome fragrant flowers, blue, purple, yellow, or variously colored. Some species produce edible bulbs, and many from the Cape of Good Hope are cultivated for ornament, among them M. papilionacea, the butterfly-iris.

Moræeæ (mō-rē′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1883), < Moræa + -eæ.] A tribe of monocotyledonous plants of the family Iridaceæ, typified by the genus Moræa, and characterized by two or more flowers from one spathe, and by having branches of the style opposite the anthers and often closely applied to them. Among its genera are Iris and Moræa.

morainal (mō-rā′nal), a. Same as morainic.

moraine (mō-rān′), n. [< F. moraine; cf. ★It. mora, a heap of stones, < G. dialectal (Bav.) mur, sand and broken stones, debris.] The accumulations of rock and detrital material upon the surface or along the edges of a glacier or the deposits of such material formed by a glacier or ice-sheet. In valley glaciers, the detrital materials of bordering mountains, being loosened by frost, rain, and gravity, fall upon the ice beneath and are gradually conveyed downward, receiving additions as they move. A simple glacier has ordinarily two such lateral moraines, and when two glaciers meet and unite the two adjacent lateral moraines coalesce and form a medial moraine, and the same thing may be repeated again and again as various lateral glaciers unite themselves with the main ones. At the point where the glaciers end the detritus of the lateral and medial moraines is thrown upon the ground, and forms a more or less irregular pile of debris, called the terminal moraine. The debris that is slowly dragged beneath a glacier, and that is therefore closely packed upon the rock-floor, is called the ground moraine. The great moraines of continental ice-sheets, as in North America and Europe, are usually arranged in curved belts, corresponding to the lobate pattern of the ice border: morainic belts that bend forward (usually southward) around the ice lobes that formed them are known as lobate moraines, while the cusps where two such belts unite are called interlobate moraines. Retreatal moraines or moraines of recession are ★those deposited during the retreat of a glacier.

morainic (mō-rā′nik), a. [< moraine + -ic.] Pertaining to, formed by, or constituting a moraine.

moral (mor′al), a. and n. [Formerly also morall, morale; = D. moraal = G. Dan. Sw. moral, < F. moral = Sp. Pg. moral = It. morale, relating to ethics; as a noun, F. moral, moral condition, morale = Sp. Pg. moral = It. morale, morals; < L. moralis, relating to manners or morals (first used by Cicero, to translate Gr. ἠθικός, moral: see ethic), < mos (mor-), manner, custom, pl. mores, manners, customs, morals. From L. mos are also ult. E. morose[1] and demure.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to rules of right conduct; concerning the distinction of right from wrong; ethical. In this sense moral is opposed to non-moral, which denotes the absence of ethical distinctions.

> Thies bodely dedis ar tokyne and shewynge of moralle vertues. Hampole, Prose Treatises (E. E. T. S.), p. 21.
> Another sort of relation, which is the conformity or disagreement men's voluntary actions have to a rule to which they are referred, and by which they are judged of, . . . may be called moral relation. Locke, Human Understanding, II. xxviii. 4.
>
> We are bound to note the circumstance that the moral, which at one time coincides with the "ethical," at other times is co-extensive with the "voluntary." A. Bain, Emotions and Will, p. 520.
>
> Even the feelings which we call moral, on account of their connection with will and desire, often have an indefinite part of them so combined with feelings located in the bodily organism, or so dependent on its functions for their quantity and quality, that a strict separation becomes impossible. G. T. Ladd, Physiol. Psychology, p. 507.
>
> Kant says that the end of Self-love, our own happiness, cannot be an end for the Moral Reason; that the force of the reasonable Will, in which Virtue consists, is always exhibited in resistance to natural egoistic impulses. H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 347.
>
> When in his self-consciousness he [man] realized that through transgression he had become guilty, doubtless all things about him seemed different, because in his own soul there had been a moral revolution. Bibliotheca Sacra, XLV. 645.
>
> War is a moral teacher: opposition to external force is an aid to the highest civic virtues. Woolsey, Introd. to International Law, § 6.

2. In accord with, or controlled by, the rules of right conduct: opposed to immoral. In this sense moral is often used specifically of conduct in the sexual relation.

> The wiser and more morale part of mankind were forced to set up laws and punishments, to keep the generallity of mankind in some tolerable order. Sir M. Hale, Orig. of Mankind, p. 355.
>
> Take a moral act. What is it that constitutes it moral? Its tendency, at least according to Shaftesbury's system, is to promote the general welfare or the good of mankind. Fowler, Shaftesbury and Hutcheson, p. 94.
>
> "What do you mean by a thoroughly moral man?" said I. "Oh, I suppose every one means the same by that," said Melissa, with a slight air of rebuke. "Sir Gavial is an excellent family man—quite blameless there; and so charitable round his place at Tiptop." . . . When a man whose business hours, the solid part of every day, are spent in an unscrupulous course of public or private action which has every calculable chance of causing widespread injury and misery, can be called moral because he comes home to dine with his wife and children and cherishes the happiness of his own hearth, the augury is not good for the use of high ethical and theological disputation. George Eliot, Theophrastus Such, xvi.

3. In a special sense, relating to the private and social duties of men as distinct from civil responsibilities: specifically so used in the Hegelian philosophy.

> "When St. Crispin steals leather to make shoes for the poor, that act is moral (moralisch) and wrong (unrechtlich)"—a remark which explains Hegel's use of moralisch better than much commentary. D. G. Ritchie, Mind, XIII. 433.

4. Connected with the perception of right and wrong in conduct, especially when this is regarded as an innate power of the mind; connected with or pertaining to the conscience. See moral sense, moral law, below.

> The development of a high moral sensibility can scarcely fail to bring suffering with it, as the mind recognises the meanness of actual attainment. J. Sully, Sensation and Intuition, p. 156.
>
> The problem of exercising the child's moral feelings is clearly connected with that of forming his moral character. J. Sully, Outlines of Psychol., p. 568.

5. Capable of distinguishing between right and wrong; hence, bound to conform to what is right; subject to a principle of duty; accountable.

> A moral agent is a being that is capable of those actions that have a moral quality, and which can properly be denominated good or evil in a moral sense, virtuous or vicious, commendable or faulty. Edwards, Freedom of the Will, i. 5.

6. Depending upon considerations of what generally occurs; resting upon grounds of probability: opposed to demonstrative: as, moral evidence; moral arguments. See moral certainty, under certainty.

> A moral universality is when the predicate agrees to the greatest part of the particulars which are contained under the subject. Watts, Logick.
>
> Physical and mathematical certainty may be styled infallible: and moral certainty may be properly styled indubitable. Bp. Wilkins.
>
> Be that my task, replies a gloomy clerk,
> Sworn foe to mystery, yet divinely dark;
> Whose pious hope aspires to see the day
> When moral evidence shall quite decay,
> And damns implicit faith, and holy lies,
> Prompt to impose, and fond to dogmatize.
> Pope, Dunciad, iv. 462.

7. Of or pertaining to morals.—8†. Having a moral; emblematical; allegorical; symbolical.

> By my troth, I have no moral meaning; I meant plain holy-thistle. Shak., Much Ado, iii. 4. 80.
>
> A thousand moral paintings I can show,
> That shall demonstrate these quick blows of Fortune's
> More pregnantly than words. Shak., T. of A., i. 1. 90.

9. Pertaining to the mind; mental: opposed to physical.

> Youth, thou bear'st thy father's face;
> Frank nature, rather curious than in haste,
> Hath well composed thee. Thy father's moral parts > Mayst thou inherit too! Shak., All's Well, i. 2. 21.

10. Pertaining to the will, or conative element of the soul, as distinguished from the intellect or cognitive part. This refers to the usual pre-Kantian division of the soul.—11. Moralizing. [Rare.]

> France spreads his banners in our noiseless land, . . .
> Whiles thou, a moral fool, sit'st still and criest,
> "Alack, why does he so?" Shak., Lear, iv. 2. 58.

Moral cause, a person who incites another to do or not to do something.

> Author here is said to be him who, proposing reasons, persuades the principal cause either to or from action; he is also called the moral cause. Burgersdicius, tr. by a Gentleman.

Moral certainty. See certainty.—Moral defeat. See moral victory.—Moral dependence, evidence, force. See the nouns.—Moral faculty. Same as moral sense.—Moral good either virtue or a virtuous action, or a pleasure or pain coming from such an action.—Moral goodness. See goodness.—Moral inability. See inability, 2.—Moral insanity. See insanity.—Moral law. (a) The law of conscience or duty; either a single central principle of right conduct, or the system of rules which should govern conduct. (b) See law[1].—Moral necessity. See necessity.—Moral philosophy. (a) The philosophy of mind; psychology. (b) Ethics; the science of morality.—Moral sense, a phrase used by Shaftesbury, but brought into greater prominence by Francis Hutcheson in 1725, to denote a determination of the mind to receive amiable or disagreeable ideas of actions, antecedent to any opinion of advantage or loss to redound from them; conscience.—Moral theology, morals viewed as a system of spiritual laws proceeding from a divine law-giver; theological ethics.—Moral victory, an actual defeat claimed as a virtual victory. This designation is often applied to a defeat which, as from the reduction of a former adverse majority in a vote, or from other concomitant circumstances, is regarded as having in it the elements of future victory, or at least as giving occasion for some measure of satisfaction.—Moral virtue, a virtue taught by natural ethics, without revelation: opposed to theological virtue, or faith, hope, charity.

II. n. 1†. Morality; the doctrine or practice of the duties of life. [Rare.]

> Their Moral and Œconomy
> Most perfectly they made agree. Prior, An Epitaph.

2. pl. (a) Conduct; behavior; course of life in regard to right and wrong; specifically, sexual conduct: as, a man of good morals.

> Some, as corrupt in their morals as vice could make them, have yet been solicitous to have their children soberly, virtuously, and piously brought up. South, Sermons. (Latham.)
>
> I pray ye flog them upon all occasions;
> It mends their morals; never mind the pain. Byron, Don Juan, ii. 1.

(b) Moral philosophy; ethics.—3. The doctrine inculcated by a fable, apologue, or fiction; the practical lesson which anything is designed to teach; hence, intent; meaning.

> Bion. He has left me here behind, to expound the meaning or moral of his signs and tokens. Shak., T. of the S., iv. 4. 76.
>
> Beat. You have some moral in this Benedictus.
> Marg. Moral! no, by my troth, I have no moral meaning. Shak., Much Ado, iii. 4. 78.
>
> So, Lady Flora, take my lay,
> And, if you find no moral there,
> Go, look in any glass, and say
> What moral is in being fair. Tennyson, The Day-Dream, Moral.

4. An emblem, personification, or allegory; especially, an allegorical drama. See morality, 6.

> The fox, the ape, and the humble-bee,
> Were still at odds, being but three.
> There's the moral. Now the l'envoy. Shak., L. L. L., iii. 1. 88.
>
> 1 Fish. Such whales have I heard on o' the land, who never leave gaping till they've swallowed the whole parish—church, steeple, bells, and all.
> Per. A pretty moral. Shak., Pericles, ii. 1. 39.
>
> In the middle of his play (be it pastoral or comedy, moral or tragedie). Dekker, Gull's Hornebook.
>
> Lastly, Morals [or moralities] teach and illustrate the same religious truths, not by direct representation of Scriptural or legendary events and personages, but by allegorical means, abstract figures of virtues or qualities being personified in the characters appearing in these plays. A. W. Ward, Eng. Dram. Lit., I. 23.

5. A certainty. [Slang.]—6. An exact likeness; a counterpart. [Obsolete or colloq.]

> He has got the trick of the eye and the tip of the nose of my uncle; . . . and as for the long chin, it is the very moral of the governor's. Smollett, Humphrey Clinker, p. 385.
>
> She 's the very pictur—yes, the very moral of Dick Turpin's Bess.
> D. Jerrold, St. Giles and St. James, p. 110. (Hoppe.)

=Syn. 2. See morality.—3. See inference.

moral† (mor′al), v. i. [< moral[1], a.] To moralize.

> When I did hear
> The motley fool thus moral on the time,
> My lungs began to crow like chanticleer. Shak., As you Like it, ii. 7. 29.

morale (mō-ràl′), n. [Intended for F. moral, m., mental or moral condition, confused with morale, f., morality, good conduct, < moral, moral: see moral.] Moral or mental condition as regards courage, zeal, hope, confidence, and the like: used especially of a body of men engaged in a hazardous enterprise, as soldiers or sailors in time of war.

From a date much earlier than the day when Cæsar, defeated at Dyrrachium, gained the empire of the world by so acting as to restore the morale of his army before the great contest at Pharsalia, it has been on this nice feeling of the moral pulse of armies that the skill of great commanders has chiefly depended. Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 343.

moraler† (mor′al-ėr), n. [< moral, v., + -er[1].] A moralizer; a moralist.

Come, you are too severe a moraler.
Shak., Othello, ii. 3. 301.

moralisation, moralise, etc. See moralization, etc.

moralism (mor′al-izm), n. [< moral + -ism.] 1. A moral maxim or saying; moral counsel or advice; moral sermonizing; inculcation of morality. [Rare.]

Accustomed as he was to the somewhat droning moralisms of his "congenial friends." Farrar, Julian Home, xx.

2. The practice of morality as distinct from religion; the absorption of religion in mere morality.

The first thing that disclosed to Dr. Chalmers the futility of the moralism which was all the religion he had when he began his pastorate at Kilmany was the discovery that it could not bear the scrutiny of the sick-bed.
A. Phelps, My Study, p. 301.

moralist (mor′al-ist), n. [= F. moraliste = Sp. Pg. It. moralista; as moral + -ist.] 1. One who teaches morals; a writer or lecturer on ethics; one who inculcates moral duties.

Nature surely (if she will be studied) is the best moralist, and hath much good counsel hidden in her bosome.
Sir H. Wotton, Reliquiæ, p. 77.

The advice given by a great moralist to his friend was that he should compose his passions. Addison.

The Rational Moralists (Cudworth, Wollaston, Clarke, Price) give no account of the final end of morality.
A. Bain, Emotions and Will, p. 257.

2. One who practises moral as distinguished from religious duties; a merely moral as distinguished from a religious person. [Rare.]

Another is carnal, and a mere moralist.
South, Sermons, VII. 286.

Sweet moralist! afloat on life's rough sea,
The Christian has an art unknown to thee.
Cowper, A Reflection on Horace, book ii., ode 10.

moralistic (mor-a-lis′tik), a. [< moralist + -ic.] Inculcating morality; didactic: as, moralistic poets.

morality (mō-ral′i-ti), n.; pl. moralities (-tiz). [< ME. moralitee = D. moraliteit = G. moralität = Sw. Dan. moralitet, < OF. moralite, F. moralité = Sp. moralidad = Pg. moralidade = It. moralità, morality, morals, < LL. moralita(t-)s, manner, characteristic, character, < L. moralis, of manners or morals, moral: see moral.] 1. The doctrine or system of duties; morals; ethics.

The end of morality is to procure the affections to obey reason, and not to invade it.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

Moral philosophy, morality, ethics, casuistry, natural law, mean all the same thing, namely, that science which teaches men their duty and the reasons of it.
Paley, Moral Philos., i. 1.

The attempt to exhibit morality as a body of scientific truth fell into discredit, and the disposition to dwell on the emotional side of the moral consciousness became prevalent. H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 91.

2. The character of being moral; accord with the rules of right conduct; moral quality; virtuousness: often used in a restricted sense to denote sexual purity.

The morality of an action is founded on the freedom of that principle by virtue of which it is in the agent's power, having all things ready and requisite to the performance of an action, either to perform or not perform it.
South, Sermons.

Until we have altered our dictionaries, and have found some other word than morality to stand in popular use for the duties of man to man, let us refuse to accept as moral the contractor who enriches himself by using large machinery to make pasteboard soles pass as leather for the feet of unhappy conscripts.
George Eliot, Theophrastus Such, xvi.

3. Moral conduct; the practice of the duties inculcated by the moral rules that are recognized as valid; in a general and collective sense, those forms of human conduct which are the subject of moral judgments.

Morality [in Shaftesbury's theory] is only Beauty in one of its higher stages.
Fowler, Shaftesbury and Hutcheson, p. 126.

Our theory has been that the development of morality is founded on the action in man of an idea of true or absolute good, consisting in the full realisation of the capabilities of the human soul.
T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 286.

In point of fact, however, morality means nothing more nor less than that state of natural neutrality or indifference to good and evil, to heaven and hell, which distinguishes man from all other existence, and endows him alone with selfhood or freedom. H. James, Subs. and Shad., p. 4.

Hence — 4. The practice of moral duties regarded as apart from and as not based upon vital religious principle.

All others, they [the Jews] thought, served God only with their own Inventions, or placed their Religion in dull morality. Stillingfleet, Sermons, I. viii.

Morality, thou deadly bane,
Thy tens of thousands thou hast slain!
Vain is his hope whose stay and trust is
In moral mercy, truth, and justice!
Burns, Dedication to Gavin Hamilton.

5. A moral inference or reflection; a moralization; intent; meaning; moral.

But ye that holden this tale a folye,
As of a fox, or of a cok and hen,
Taketh the moralite thereof, goode men.
Chaucer, Nun's Priest's Tale, l. 620.

A genial optimist, who daily drew
From what he saw his quaint moralities.
Bryant, The Old Man's Counsel.

6. A kind of drama which succeeded the miracle-plays or mysteries, and in which the persons of the play were abstractions, or allegorical representations of virtues, vices, and mental powers and faculties. A popular feature of the moralities was the introduction of the Devil and a Vice who under many names attended him, and who was finally merged in the fool of the later drama.

A morality may be defined as a play enforcing a moral truth or lesson by means of the speech and action of characters which are personified abstractions — figures representing virtues and vices, qualities of the human mind, or abstract conceptions in general.
A. W. Ward, Eng. Dram. Lit., I. 55.

=Syn. 1–3. Morality, Morals, Manners, Virtue, Ethics. Morality (or morals) and manners stand over against each other as respectively conforming to right or propriety in the great duties and in the minor forms of action and intercourse. Morality is often popularly applied to conformity to right in that particular in which right conduct is most felt to be important, as chastity or honesty. Virtue is morality of the fullest type and regarded as a part of personal character. Ethics is the technical, as morals is the popular, name for the science of virtue.

moralization (mor″al-i-zā′shọn), n. [< F. moralisation = Sp. moralización = Pg. moralisação = It. moralizzazione, < ML. moralisatio(n-), moralizatio(n-), < moralizare, moralize: see moralize.] 1. The act of moralizing or reflecting upon morals; a moral reflection. — 2. The act of giving a moral meaning or effect to something; explanation in a moral sense.

It is more commendable, and also commodious, if the players haue red the moralization of the chesse, and whan they playe do thynke vpon it.
Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, i. 26.

Annexed to the fable is a moralization of twice the length in the octave stanza.
T. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, III. 417.

John de Vigney wrote a book which he called "The Moralization of Chess," wherein he assures us that this game was invented by a philosopher named Xerxes in the reign of Evil Merodach, king of Babylon, and was made known to that monarch in order to engage his attention and correct his manners. "There are three reasons," says de Vigney, "which induced the philosopher to institute this new pastime: the first, to reclaim a wicked king; the second, to prevent idleness; and the third, practically to demonstrate the nature and necessity of nobleness."
Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 406.

3. The act of rendering moral; subjection to moral rules; the process of giving a moral character to something.

The elimination of ethics, then, as a system of precepts, involves no intrinsic difficulties other than those involved in the admission of a natural science that can account for the moralisation of man.
T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 8.

The highest type of moralisation lies in acquiring such an abstract basis of principle as makes a man a spontaneous and independent fountain of justice and goodness, not a mere channel through which runs a public and common beneficence. W. Wallace, Mind, XIII. 425.

Also spelled moralisation.

moralize (mor′al-īz), v.; pret. and pp. moralized, ppr. moralizing. [= D. moraliseren = G. moralisiren = Sw. moralisera = Dan. moralisere, < F. moraliser = Sp. Pg. moralizar = It. moralizzare, < ML. moralizare, moralize, < L. moralis, moral: see moral and -ize.] I. trans. 1. To apply to a moral purpose, or to explain in a moral sense; draw a moral from; found moral reflections on.

But what said Jaques?
Did he not moralize this spectacle?
Shak., As you Like it, ii. 1. 44.

2. To supply with a moral or practical lesson; furnish with edifying examples.

Fierce warres and faithful loves shall moralize my song.
Spenser, F. Q., Prol.

High as their Trumpets Tune his Lyre he strung,
And with his Prince's Arms he moraliz'd his Song.
Prior, Ode to the Queen, st. 1.

While chastening thoughts of sweetest use, bestowed
By wisdom, moralize his pensive road. Wordsworth.

3. To exemplify the moral of: as, to moralize a fable. [Rare.]

That which is said of the elephant, that being guilty of his deformity he cannot abide to look on his own face in the water (but seeks for troubled and muddy channels), we see well moralized in men of evil conscience, who know their souls are so filthy that they dare not so much as view them.
Bp. Hall, Meditations and Vows, ii. § 4.

This fable is moralized in a common proverb.
Sir R. L'Estrange.

4. To render moral; give a moral character to.

It had a large share in moralizing the poor white people of the country. G. Ramsay.

'Tis yours with Breeding to refine the Age,
To Chasten Wit, and Moralize the Stage.
Steele, Conscious Lovers, Prol.

As a rule, it will only be to a man already pretty thoroughly moralised by the best social influences that it will occur to reproach himself with having unworthy motives even in irreproachable conduct.
T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 300.

5. To affect strongly the moral or religious sense of; bring into a state of intense moral or religious feeling. [Rare.]

The negroes and many of the poor whites were, for a week or two, not exactly "demoralized" [by an earthquake], but intensely moralized, giving themselves to religious exercises of a highly emotional character.
Science, IX. 491.

II. intrans. 1. To make moral reflections; draw practical lessons from the facts of life.

Thou hear'st me moralize,
Applying this to that, and so to so,
For love can comment upon every woe.
Shak., Venus and Adonis, l. 712.

I know you come abroad only to moralize and make observations. Steele, Tatler, No. 170.

Peter of Blois moralising "de præstigiis fortunæ," on the magic tricks of Fortune exemplified in the career of his royal patron. Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 147.

2. To have an influence, especially a beneficial influence, on morals.

It is not so much that a social life passed in peaceful occupation is positively moralizing as that a social life passed in war is positively demoralizing.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 575.

Also spelled moralise.

moralizer (mor′al-ī-zėr), n. 1. One who moralizes or makes moral reflections; an instructor in morals.

My uncle was a moralizer who mistook his apophthegms for principles. T. Hook, Sayings and Doings.

In fact there is scarcely any point upon which moralizers have dwelt with more emphasis than this, that man's forecast of pleasure is continually erroneous.
H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 121.

2†. One who has a habit of finding an allegory or hidden meaning in passages.

Moralizers, you that wrest a never meant meaning out of everything, applying all things to the present time, keep your attention for the common stage.
Nash, Sumner's Last Will and Testament.

Also spelled moraliser.

moralizing (mor′al-ī-zing), n. [Verbal n. of moralize, v.] A moral reflection; a moralization. Also spelled moralising.

It will be seen by these edifying moralizings how eminently Scriptural was the course of Sam's mind.
H. B. Stowe, Oldtown, p. 359.

morally (mor′al-i), adv. 1. From a moral point of view; with reference to the moral law; in a moral or ethical sense; ethically.

By good, morally so called, bonum honestum ought chiefly to be understood. South, Sermons.

The essential thing morally is the man's direction of himself to the realisation of a conceived or imagined object, whether circumstances allow of its issuing in outward action, action that affects the senses of other people, or no. T. H. Green, Prolegomena to Ethics, § 144.

2. In accordance with moral law; rightly; virtuously; uprightly.

To take away rewards and punishments is only pleasing to a man who resolves not to live morally. Dryden.

3. Virtually; practically; to all intents and purposes.

It is morally impossible for a hypocrite to keep himself long on his guard. Sir R. L'Estrange.

morass (mō-ràs′), n. [= G. morast = Sw. moras = Dan. morads, < D. moeras, MD. moerasch, moorasch, maerasch = LG. II. n. 1. A native or an inhabitant of Moravia, a crownland of the Cisleithan division of Austria-Hungary, lying southeast of Bohemia. More than two thirds of the Moravians are Slavs in race and language.—2. A member of the Christian denomination entitled the Unitas Fratrum or United Brethren, which traces its origin to John Huss. Its members were expelled from Bohemia and from Moravia in 1627, but in 1722 a remnant settled in Herrnhut, Saxony (hence the brethren are sometimes, in Germany, called Herrnhuter). The organization at present has three home provinces (German, British, and American—each of which has its own government by synod) and several mission provinces. All these together form a whole, represented by a general synod, which meets every ten years in Herrnhut. The ministers are bishops (not diocesan), presbyters, and deacons. The worship is liturgical. The members of the denomination believe in the Scriptures as the only rule of faith and practice, and maintain the doctrines of the total depravity of human nature, the love of God the Father, the actual humanity and godhead of Jesus Christ, the atonement, the work of the Holy Spirit, good works as the fruit of the Spirit, the second coming of Christ, and the resurrection of the dead. The Moravians are especially noted for their energy and success in missionary work.

Moravianism (mō-rā′vi-an-izm), n. [< Moravian + -ism.] The religious doctrines and church polity of the Moravians, or United Brethren.

★moray (mō′rā), n. [Also maray, muray, murry; origin uncertain.] One of many apodal eel-like fishes of the family Muræniдæ, and especially of the genus Muræna, of which there are several subdivisions, as Sidera. As applied to mental conditions, it commonly implies an over-sensitive state, involving depression of spirits, in which matters affecting the emotions assume an exaggerated significance.

A vicious ingenuity, a morbid quickness to perceive resemblances and analogies between things apparently heterogeneous. Macaulay, Dryden.

The morbid asceticism that culminates in the life of the Buddhist saint, eating his food with loathing from the alms-bowl that he carries, as though it held medicine.
E. B. Tylor, Prim. Culture, II. 96.

2. Proceeding from or characteristic of disease or a diseased condition.

Whilst the distempers of a relaxed fibre prognosticate and prepare all the morbid force of convulsion in the body of the state. Burke, A Regicide Peace, I.

3. Relating to disease: as, morbid or pathological anatomy.—Morbid concretions. See concretion.=Syn. 1. Diseased, etc. See sick.

morbidezza (mor-bi-det′zä), n. [It. (> Sp. Pg. morbidez = F. morbidesse), sickliness, delicacy, < morbido, sickly: see morbid.] That quality of flesh-painting which simulates the suppleness, elastic firmness, and soft delicacy of natural flesh.

Nature has been closely consulted, and has revealed to the master a few delicate touches which serve to accentuate the movement, and to give to the flesh that morbidezza which is the illusion of the softness and palpitation of life. Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 248.

morbidity (môr-bid′i-ti), n. [< F. morbidité; as morbid + -ity.] 1. A morbid condition or state; morbidness.

Unable from some defect or morbidity. Kingsley.

There are no women to chaff with, and to rub your mind out of its morbidity. S. Bowles, in Merriam, I. 369.

2. The proportion of diseased persons in a community; the sick-rate. [Recent.]

This term, which is of recent introduction, is employed to denote the amount of disease or illness existing in a given community; and, as "mortality" expresses the death-rate, so morbidity indicates the sick-rate, whether the disease be fatal or not. Quain, Med. Dict., p. 998.

morbidly (môr′bid-li), adv. In a morbid or diseased manner; in a way that indicates a diseased or morbid condition. See morbid, 1.

The actions of men amply prove that the faculty which gives birth to those arts is morbidly active.
Macaulay, Dryden.

morbidness (môr′bid-nes), n. The state of being morbid, diseased, sickly, or unsound; morbidity.

important genus of beetles, typical of the family Mordellidæ, characterized by the moderate subequilateral scutellum. These beetles are of small or medium size, usually shining-black in color, and inhabit fungi or twigs. There are more than 100 species, most of which inhabit Europe or North and South America, 17 being recorded as North American, as M. 8-punctata.

Mordellidæ (môr-del'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Mordella + -idæ.] A family of heteromerous Coleoptera, typified by the genus Mordella. They have the anterior coxal cavities open behind, the head strongly constricted at the base and suddenly narrowed behind, the lateral suture distinct, the base as wide as the elytra, the antennæ filiform, and the hind coxæ laminiform. These insects resemble the Rhipiphoridæ, but the antennæ are filiform, and the thorax has a lateral suture; they are of small size, pubescent, and glistening-black. They are abundantly found on flowers, particularly on certain Compositæ. The larvæ have short legs, the joints of which are indistinct; they live in fungi and twigs. The family was established by Stephens in 1832.

mordenite (môr'den-īt), n. [< Morden (see def.) + *-ite*2.] A zeolitic mineral occurring in small hemispherical forms with a fibrous structure, whitish color, and silky luster. It is a hydrous silicate of aluminium, calcium, and sodium, and is found near Morden in Nova Scotia.

mordent (môr'dent), n. [< It. mordente, in music, a beat, a turn, a passing shake, < mordente, biting, pungent: see mordant.] In music: (a) A melodic embellishment, not so frequent now as formerly, consisting of a rapid alternation of a principal tone with a tone a half-step below it. It is single or short when the by-tone is used but once; otherwise double or long. The signs for the single and double mordents are ∾ and ⩕ respectively. When the supplementary tone needs to be chromatically altered, a ♯, ♭, or ♮ is added below the sign.

Mordent.
1, as written; 2, as performed.

(b) Same as acciaccatura or passing trill (German Pralltriller), the latter of which is also called an inverted mordent.

mordente (môr-den'te), n. [It.: see mordent.] Same as mordent.

I heard thy anxious Coach-man say,
It costs thee more in Whips than Hay.
Prior, Epigram.

When our attention passes from a shorter line to a longer, from a smaller spot to a larger, from a feebler light to a stronger, from a paler blue to a richer, from a march tune to a galop, the transition is accompanied in the synthetic field of consciousness by a peculiar feeling of difference, which is what we call the sensation of more,—more length, more expanse, more light, more blue, more motion. W. James, Mind, XII. 15.

2. Something superior or further or in addition: corresponding to I., 2, with partitive genitive merged.

'Tis not in mortals to command success;
But we 'll do more, Sempronius; we 'll deserve it.

Thicker than arguments, temptations throng,
At best more watchful this, but that more strong.
Pope, Essay on Man, ii. 76.

[In this sense more is regularly used to modify an adjective or adverb and form a comparative phrase, having the same force and effect as the comparative degree made by the termination *-er*3: as, more wise (wiser), more wisely; more illustrious, more illustriously; more contemptible; more durable. It may be used before any adjective or adverb which admits of comparison, and is generally used with words of more than two syllables, in which the use of the suffix -er would be awkward: as, more curious, more eminent, etc.; formations like curiouser, virtuouser, etc., being avoided, though occasionally used in older writers. Formerly more was very often used superfluously in the comparative: as, more better, braver, fitter, mightier, etc.]

2. Further; to a greater distance.

And yet we ascendid mor and came to the place wher ower Savyor Crist seying and be holdyng the Citie of Jherusalem vpon Palme of Sonnday wepte. Torkington, Diarie of Eng. Travell, p. 29.

30 leagues we sayled more Northwards not finding any inhabitants. Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, I. 176.

I was walking a mile,
More than a mile from the shore.
Tennyson, Maud, ix.

3. In addition; besides; again: qualified by such words as any, no, ever, never, once, twice, etc., the two being in some cases also written together as one, as evermore, nevermore, and formerly nomore.

About 40 species are known, all tropical, mainly in Asia and Oceania, a few in Africa and America. They are shrubs or trees, with white flowers in axillary or terminal clusters, and opposite leaves. M. citrifolia and M. tinctoria, and sometimes all species of the genus, are called Indian mulberry. These and other species yield important dyes. See ach[2], ach-root, al-root. M. Royoc of the West Indies and Florida has the name yaw-weed. Seven fossil species have been described, all from the Tertiary of Europe.

Morindeæ (mō-rin'dē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1830), < Morinda + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the family Rubiaceæ. It is characterized by an ovary of from two to four cells, each with one ovule attached to the partition, and contains 70 genera and about 60 species, all trees or shrubs, chiefly tropical.

morinel (mor'i-nel), n. [< F. morinelle, dim., < L. morus, < Gr. μωρός, silly.] The dotterel, Eudromias morinellus: so called from its apparent stupidity. See cut under dotterel.

Moringa (mō-ring'gä), n. [NL. (Adanson, 1763); from its native name in Malabar.] A genus of dicotyledonous choripetalous trees, forming the family Moringaceæ, and characterized by a disk investing the tube of the calyx, ten stamens, five one-celled anthers, and an ovary of one cell with three parietal placentæ and many ovules. Four species are known, natives of northern Africa, western Asia, and the East Indies. They have white or red flowers in axillary panicles, long pods, and twice- or thrice-pinnate alternate leaves. One species, perhaps two, are important, for which see ben-nut, ben-oil, horseradish-tree, and nephritic wood (under nephritic).

Moringaceæ (mō-ring-gā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Lindley, 1836), < Moringa + -aceæ.] A family of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants of the order Papaverales, consisting of the single genus Moringa: the Moringeæ of Robert Brown, 1826. See Moringa.

Moringua (mō-ring'gū-ä), n. [NL.] A genus of murænoid fishes founded by Sir John Richardson in 1845, type of the family Moringuidæ. M. lumbricoides is of worm-like appearance, the vertical fins being reduced to a fold around the end of the tail.

Moringuidæ (mō-ring-gū'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Moringua + -idæ.] A family of murænoid apodal fishes represented by the genus Moringua. They are of eel-like form, with specially elongated abdominal region; the heart is situated far behind the gills, and the pterygopalatine arch and opercular apparatus are imperfect. The several species inhabit Oriental seas. Also Ptyobranchina.

Morin's apparatus. [After the French inventor A. J. Morin (1795–1880).] An apparatus designed to illustrate the laws of falling bodies. It consists of a light wooden cylinder covered with paper, made to rotate uniformly about a vertical axis, in front of which falls a small weight, guided by two light wires. A pencil attached to the falling weight traces out on the paper of the rotating cylinder a line which, so long as the effect of the air-resistance is negligible, is found to be a parabolic curve. The distance fallen through is thus shown to vary according to the square of the time, in accordance with the theoretical law.

Morio (mō'ri-ō), n. [NL., < L. morio, a fool, a monster.] 1. In entom., a genus of caraboid beetles, containing such as M. monilicornis of the southern United States. The genus pertains to the scaritid section of Carabidæ, and is sometimes made type of a family Morionidæ. It is of wide distribution, but has only about 25 species. These are mainly South American, but some are found in Africa, the East Indies, and Australia, and 2 in Europe. One occurs in the United States. Latreille, 1810.

2. A genus of mollusks. Montfort, 1810.

morion[1] (mō'ri-on), n. [Formerly also morian, morrion, murrion, murrian; < OF. (and F.) morion = It. morione = Pg. morrião, < Sp. morrión, a morion, prob. < morra, the crown of the head, < morro, anything round; cf. morón, a hillock; perhaps < Basque murua, a hill.] A form of helmet of iron, steel, or brass, somewhat like a hat in shape, often with a crest or comb over the top, Morion of Spanish make, with comb; 16th century.

and without beaver or vizor, introduced into England from France or Spain about the beginning of the sixteenth century.

Swords, Morrions, Pouldrons, Vaunt-brace, Pikes, & Lances
Are no defence, but rather hinderances.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Vocation.

I have provided me a morion, for fear of a clap on a coxcomb. Ford, Lover's Melancholy, iv. 2.

Their beef they often in their murrions stew'd.
W. King, Art of Cookery.

Cockscomb morion. See cockscomb.—Spanish morion, a form of morion which has a broad brim like a hat, as contrasted with the combed morion.

morion[2] (mō'ri-on), n. [Appar. short for L. mormorion, a kind of dark-brown rock-crystal.] A variety of smoky quartz having a very dark-brown or nearly black color. It is probably the same as the mormorion of Pliny, although some writers refer this to black tourmalin.

Morionidæ (mō-ri-on'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Morio(n-) + -idæ.] A family of caraboid Coleoptera, named from the genus Morio. They have the middle coxæ separate, and the fore legs more or less enlarged at the tip. There are about 12 genera, mainly discriminated by the peculiarities of the elytral striæ. Though the species are not numerous, they are distributed throughout most of the warm portions of the globe.

morioplasty (mō'ri-ō-plas-ti), n. [< Gr. μόριον, dim. of μόρος, a part, + πλαστός, verbal adj. of πλάσσειν, form.] In surg., the repair of lost or injured parts; autoplasty; plastic surgery.

Morisco (mō-ris'kō), a. and n. [Formerly also Morisko (and Morisk); < Sp. morisco: see Moorish[2], Moresque, morris[1].] I. a. Same as Moresque.

They trim it with paint after the morisco manner.
Sir T. Herbert, Travels in Africa, p. 129.

A piece of as good Morisco work as any I had yet seen.
H. Swinburne, Travels through Spain, xxxi.

II. n. 1. In Span. hist., a person of the Moorish race; a Moor. The name was applied to the Moors after their conquest by the Spaniards; they were expelled from Spain in 1609.

These two circumstances leave no reasonable doubt that the writer of the poem was one of the many Moriscos who . . . had forgotten their native language and adopted that of their conquerors. Ticknor, Span. Lit., I. 86.

2†. The language of the Moors of Spain.

He, leaping in front of all, set hand to his falchion, and said, in morisco, let none of you that are here stir. . . . The Moors, hearing their master say so, were marvellously amazed. Shelton, tr. of Don Quixote, iv. 14. (Latham.)

3†. The Moorish dance known also as morris-dance.—4†. A dancer of the morris-dance.

I have seen
Him caper upright like a wild Morisco,
Shaking the bloody darts as he his bells.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iii. 1. 365.

5. A dance performed by one person, differing from the morris-dance. See the last quotation.

Your wit skips a morisco. Marston, What you Will, iv. 1.

To this purpose were taken vp at Rome these forraine exercises of vaulting and dancing the Moriske.
Hakewill, Apology, p. 365.

The Morisco or Moor dance is exceedingly different from the morris-dance, . . . being performed by the castanets, or rattles, at the end of the fingers, and not with bells attached to various parts of the dress.
Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 309.

6†. The style of architecture or ornamentation commonly called Moorish.

morish (mōr'ish), a. [< more[1] + -ish[1].] 1. Such that more is needed; insufficient. [Prov. Eng.]

Lady S. How do you like this tea, Colonel?
Col. Well enough, Madam, but methinks it is a little moreish.
Lady S. Oh, Colonel, I understand you; Betty, bring the cannister. Swift, Polite Conversation, i.

2. Such that more is desired; nice. [Colloq.]

Morisk†, Morisko†, a. and n. Obsolete forms of Morisco.

Morisonian (mor-i-sō'ni-an), a. and n. [< Morison (see def. of Morisonianism) + -ian.] I. a. Pertaining to Morisonianism.

II. n. A member of the Evangelical Union. See Morisonianism.

Morisonianism (mor-i-sō'ni-an-izm), n. [< Morisonian + -ism.] The system of doctrines professed by one of the religious denominations of Scotland, the Evangelical Union (which see, under evangelical). [The terms Morisonian and Morisonianism, derived from the name of James Morison, one of the originators of the body, are now very little used.]

morkin† (môr'kin), n. [For mortkin*, < OF. mortekine, mortecine, morticine = OIt. morticino, "any dead carrion" (Florio) (Ir. muirtchenn = W. burgyn), < ML. morticinum, a beast that has died of disease, neut. of L. morticinus, that has died (as an animal), dead, hence carrion, < mor(t-)s, death: see mort[1]. Cf. mortling.] A beast that has died by sickness or mischance, or (according to Halliwell) that is the product of an abortive birth.

Could he not sacrifice
Some sorry morkin that unbidden dies?
Bp. Hall, Satires, III. iv. 4.

morl (môrl), n. [Appar. a native name.] An Asiatic deer, Cervus wallichi.

morland†, n. An obsolete form of moorland.

morling, mortling (môr'-, môrt'ling), n. [< mort[2] + -ling[1]. Cf. morkin.] 1. A sheep or other animal dead by disease.

A wretched, withered mortling, and a piece
Of carrion, wrapt up in a golden fleece.
Fasciculus Florum, p. 35. (Nares.)

2. Wool from a dead sheep. Blount.

morlop (môr'lop), n. [Origin obscure.] A variety of jasper pebble found in New South Wales. See the quotation.

Amongst the jasper pebbles are some of pale mottled tints of yellow, pink, drab, brown, bluish gray, &c. These are termed morlops by the miners, and are regarded by them with much favor, as they say that they never find one in the dish without diamonds accompanying it.
U. S. Cons. Report (1886), No. 70, p. 319.

mormaer (môr'mär), n. [< Gael. mormhaor, high steward, < mor, great, + maor, steward. Cf. maormor.] Same as maormor.

mormaership (môr'mär-ship), n. [< mormaer + -ship.] The office of a mormaer or maormor.

From these mormaerships, which correspond with the ancient mor tuatha, came most, if not all, the ancient Scottish earldoms. Encyc. Brit., X. 800.

mormal† (môr'mal), n. [< ME. mormal, mormall, morimal, morrimal, marmole, mortmal, < OF. mortmal, mormal, F. mort mal, OF. also malmort, < ML. malum mortuum, an old sore, an evil: malum, neut. of malus, bad, evil; mortuum, neut. of mortuus, dead: see mort[1].] A cancer or gangrene; an old sore.

Gret harm was it, as it thoughte me,
That on his schyne a mormal hadde he.
Chaucer, Gen. Prol. to C. T., l. 386.

Luxiria ys a lyther mormale.
Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 218.

They will give him a quantity of the quintessence shall serve him to cure kibes or the mormal o' the shin.
B. Jonson, Mercury Vindicated.

mormeluche†, n. [< Gr. μορμολύκη, μορμολυκεῖον, μορμολύκειον, μορμολύκιον, a bugbear, hobgoblin, < μορμολύττεσθαι, also μόρμυσσεσθαι, frighten, scare, be scared, < μορμώ, a bugbear.] A hobgoblin; a bugbear.

They hear and see many times, devils, bugbears, and mormeluches. Burton, Anat. of Mel., p. 659.

mormo (môr'mō), n. [NL. in sense 2, < Gr. μορμώ, also μορμών, a hideous she-monster, a bugbear.] 1†. A bugbear; false terror.

One would think by this play the devils were mere mormos and bugbears, fit only to fright children and fools.
Jeremy Collier, English Stage, p. 192. (Halliwell.)

The mormos and bugbears of a frighted rabble.
Warburton, Prodigies, p. 80.

2. [cap.] In entom., a genus of noctuid moths of the subfamily Amphipyrinæ, erected by Hübner in 1816, having the tufted abdomen extended beyond the hind wings. The only species, M. maura, is distributed throughout Europe.

Mormon[1] (môr'mon), n. [NL., < Gr. μορμών, a bugbear: see mormo.] In zoöl., the name, generic or specific, of several animals. (a) In mammal.: (1) [l. c.] The specific name of the mandrill, a baboon, Cynocephalus mormon. See mandrill. (2) A genus of such baboons founded by Lesson, 1840. M. leucophæus is the drill. See Cynocephalus. (b) In ornith., a genus of puffins of the family Alcidæ, founded by Illiger, 1811: now more frequently called Fratercula. M. arcticus is a current name of the common puffin; M. cirratus, of the tufted puffin. See Fratercula, Lunda, and cut under puffin.

Mormon[2] (môr'mon), n. [Prop. attrib. use (the Mormon Church, Bible, etc.) of Mormon, one of the characters of the "Book of Mormon," from whom it derives that name.] An adherent of a religious body in the United States, which calls itself "The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints." This denomination was founded in 1830 by Joseph Smith, a native of Sharon, Vermont. The government of the church is a hierarchy consisting of two orders of priesthood, an order of Melchizedek (the higher) and an Aaronic or lesser order. The former is presided over by a president and two counselors whose authority extends over the entire church, and it includes the twelve apostles, the seventies, the patriarch, the high priests, and the elders. The twelve apostles constitute a traveling high council, which ordains other officers and is intrusted with general ecclesiastical authority; the seventies are the missionaries and the propagandists of the body; the patriarch pronounces the blessing of the church; the high priests officiate in the offices of the church in the absence of any higher authorities; and the elders conduct meetings and superintend the priests. The Aaronic priesthood includes the bishops, the priests, the teachers, and the deacons; the two last named are the subordinate orders in the church. The duties of the bishops are largely secular. The entire territory governed by the church is divided and subdivided into districts, for the more efficient collection of tithes and the administration of the government. The Mormons accept the Bible, the Book of Mormon, and the Book of Doctrine and Covenants as authoritative, and regard the head of their church as invested with divine authority, receiving his revelations as the word of the Lord. They maintain the doctrines of repentance and faith, a literal resurrection of the dead, the second coming of Christ and his reign upon earth (having the seat of his power in their territory), baptism by immersion, baptism for the dead, and polygamy as a sacred duty for all those who are capable of entering into such marriage. The Mormons settled first at Kirtland, Ohio, then in Missouri, and after their expulsion from these places in Nauvoo, Illinois; in 1847–8 they removed to Utah, and have since spread into Idaho, Arizona, Wyoming, etc. They have frequently defied the United States government. There is also a comparatively small branch of the Mormon Church, entitled "The Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints," which is opposed to polygamy and is ecclesiastically independent of the original organization. Also Mormonist, Mormonite.—Book of Mormon, one of the authoritative writings of the Mormon Church. According to the Mormons, it is the record of certain ancient peoples in America, abridged by the prophet Mormon, written on golden plates, and discovered by Joseph Smith at Cumorah (western New York), and translated by him. By anti-Mormons it is generally regarded as taken from a romance written about 1811 by Solomon Spaulding, whose manuscript was used by Smith and Rigdon.

Mormondom (môr'mon-dum), n. [< Mormon[2] + -dom.] The community or system of the Mormons; Mormons collectively.

Mormonism (môr'mon-izm), n. [< Mormon[2] + -ism.] The system of doctrines, practices (especially polygamy), ceremonies, and church government maintained by the Mormons.

> It is not possible to attack Mormonism with very delicate weapons. The Nation, Feb. 23, 1882, p. 161.

Mormonist (môr'mon-ist), n. [< Mormon[2] + -ist.] Same as Mormon[2].

Mormonite (môr'mon-īt), n. [< Mormon[2] + -ite[2].] Same as Mormon[2].

Mormoöps (môr-mō'ops), n. [NL.] Same as Mormops.

mormope (môr'mōp), n. A bat of the genus Mormops.

Mormopidæ (môr-mop'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Mormops + -idæ.] A family of bats named from the genus Mormops. It coincides with Lobostomatinæ.

Mormops (môr'mops), n. [NL., < Gr. μορμώ, a bugbear, + ὄψ, face, countenance.] A genus of tropical American phyllostomine bats of the subfamily Lobostomatinæ: so called from the extraordinary physiognomy, which is remarkable even among the many strange expressions of face presented by bats. M. blainvillei is the type. Also Mormoöps.

Face of Mormops blainvillei.

mormyre (môr'mīr), n. A fish of the genus Mormyrus; a mormyrian.

mormyrian (môr-mir'i-an), n. [< Mormyrus + -ian.] A fish of the family Mormyridæ.

Mormyridæ (môr-mir'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Mormyrus + -idæ.] A family of scyphophorous fishes, exemplified by the genus Mormyrus, to which different limits have been given. (a) By Bonaparte and most others it is restricted to those species which have well-developed dorsal and anal fins more or less nearly opposite each other but of varying extent, and a well-developed caudal remote from the dorsal and anal. It includes all but one of the scyphophorous fishes. (b) By Günther it is extended to include the foregoing, together with species without an anal or caudal fin placed by other authors in the family Gymnarchidæ. All have the body and tail scaly, head scaleless, margin of the upper jaw formed in the middle by the intermaxillaries, which coalesce into a single bone, and laterally by the maxillaries. The interoperculum is sometimes rudimentary, and on each side of the single parietal bone is a cavity leading into the interior of the skull. The family contains a number of fresh-water African fishes, representing several genera, some of which are remarkable for the prolongation of the snout. There is also great diversity in the development of the dorsal and anal fins, in some cases these being much lengthened and in others very short. Mormyrus oxyrhynchus is common in the Nile. Also Mormyri.

Mormyrus (môr-mī'rus), n. [NL. (cf. L. mormyr), < Gr. μορμύρος, a sea-fish.] 1. An African genus of fishes representing the family Mormyridæ. M. oxyrhynchus is the mizdeh, oxyrhynch, or sharp-nosed mormyre of the Nile. It is held in high esteem, and was venerated by the ancient Egyptians, and never eaten, because it was supposed to have devoured the privy member of the god Osiris. Some species are highly esteemed for food.

2. [l. c.] A species of this genus; a mormyre.

morn (môrn), n. [< ME. morn, contr. of morwen, morgen, mærgen, < AS. morgen, mergen = OS. morgan = OFries. morn = D. morgen = MLG. LG. morgen = OHG. morgan, morgen, morgin, MHG. G. morgen = Icel. morgunn, morginn = Sw. morgon = Dan. morgen = Goth. maurgins, morning; perhaps connected with OBulg. mĭrknati, become dark, mrakŭ, darkness, the morning being in this view the 'dim light' of early dawn. In another view, the word is orig. 'dawn,' connected with Lith. merkti, blink, Gr. μαρμαίρειν, shine, glitter (see marble). The same word, in the ME. form morwen, morgen, lost the final -n (which was understood as a suffix) and became, through morge, morwe, the source of E. morrow; while a deriv. form morning has taken the place of both forms in familiar use: see morrow, morning.] 1. The first part of the day; the morning: now used chiefly in poetry and often with personification. See morning.

> Whyt as morne milk.
> Chaucer, Gen. Prol. to C. T., l. 358.
>
> From morn
> To noon he fell, from noon to dewy eve.
> Milton, P. L., i. 742.

2. Morrow: usually preceded by the: as, the morn (that is, to-morrow). [Obsolete or Scotch.]

> Abraham ful erly watz vp on the morne.
> Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), i. 1001.

morné (môr-nā'), a. [OF. morné, pp. of morner, blunt, < morne, blunt: see morne.] In her., an epithet noting a lion rampant when depicted in coat-armor with no tongue, teeth, or claws.

morned (môrnd), a. [< morne + -ed[2].] In her., blunted; having a blunt head: said especially of a tilting-spear used as a bearing.

morniflet, n. See murnival.

morning (môr'ning), n. and a. [< ME. morninge, morowynge, morwening, morzening, < morn, morwen, morgen, morn, + -ing[1]. Cf. evening, < even[2] + -ing[1].] I. n. 1. The first part of the day, strictly from midnight to noon. In a more limited sense, morning is the time from a little before to a little after sunrise, or the time beginning a little before sunrise, or at break of day, and extending to the hour of breakfast, or to noon. Among men of business and people of fashion, the morning is often considered to extend to the hour of dining, even when this occurs several hours after noon.

> The friday erly in the witsonwike, that was a feire morowmynge and a softe, and yet was not the water ne the enchauntement lefte. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 351.

> The Duke of Devonshire took a morning's ride before dinner yesterday at seven o'clock in the afternoon.
> Hull Advertiser, April 16, 1796 (quoted in N. and Q., 7th ser., VI. 383).

2. Figuratively, the first or early part.

> O life! how pleasant in thy morning!
> Burns, To James Smith.
>
> We are Ancients of the earth,
> And in the morning of the times.
> Tennyson, Day-Dream, L'Envoi.

3. A morning dram or draught. [Scotch.]

> Of this he took a copious dram, observing he had already taken his morning with Donald Bean Lean.
> Scott, Waverley, xviii.

4. A slight repast taken at rising, some time before what is called breakfast. Jamieson. [Scotch.]—Good morning. See good.—The morn's morning. See morn.

II. a. 1. Pertaining to the first or early part of the day; being in the early part of the day, or before dinner: as, a morning concert.—2. Existing, taking place, or seen in the morning: as, morning dew; morning light; morning service: often used figuratively.

> She looks as clear
> As morning roses newly wash'd with dew.
> Shak., T. of the S., ii. 1. 174.
>
> The broad brow [of Chaucer], drooping with weight of thought, and yet with an inexpugnable youth shining out of it as from the morning forehead of a boy.
> Lowell, Study Windows, p. 229.

Morning gun, hour, etc. See the nouns.

morning-cap (môr'ning-kap), n. A cap worn during the day, on other than ceremonial occasions; especially, a cap worn by women in the morning to cover and protect the hair.

morning-flower (môr'ning-flou″ėr), n. A plant of the iris family, Orthrosanthus multiflorus. [Australia.]

morning-gift (môr'ning-gift), n. [A mod. translation of AS. morgengifu (= G. morgengabe, etc.), < morgen, morn, morning, + gifu, gift. Cf. morganatic.] A gift made to a woman by her husband the morning after marriage: a practice formerly common in Europe (in some places a legal right of the bride), but now nearly obsolete.

> Now he has wooed the young countess,
> The Countess of Balquhin,
> An' given her for a morning-gift
> Strathboggie and Aboyne.
> Lord Thomas Stuart (Child's Ballads, III. 357).

She is described as dwelling at Winchester in the possession, not only of great landed possessions, the morning-gifts of her two marriages, but of immense hoarded wealth of every kind. E. A. Freeman, Norman Conquest, II. 3.

morning-glory (môr'ning-glō″ri), n. A plant of the genus Operculina, especially O. purpurea.

morning-gown (môr'ning-goun), n. A gown suitable for wearing in the morning.

> Seeing a great many in rich morning-gowns, he was amazed to find that persons of quality were up so early.
> Addison.

> The camel bears the spice.
> Macaulay, Prophecy of Capys, st. 31.

morning-room (môr'ning-röm), n. A room used by the women of a family as a boudoir or sitting-room, and supposed to be occupied only before dinner. [Great Britain.]

morning-speech (môr'ning-spēch), n. [ME. mornspeche, morwespeche: see morrow-speech.] Same as morrow-speech. See the quotation.

> The word morning-speech (morgen-spæc) is as old as Anglo-Saxon times; "morgen" signified both "morning" and "morrow," and the origin of the term would seem to be that the meeting was held either in the morning of the same day or on the morning (the morrow) of the day after that on which the Gild held its feast and accompanying ceremonies, and that it afterwards became applied to other similar meetings of the Gild-brethren.
> English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), Int., p. xxxiii.

morning-sphinx (môr'ning-sfingks), n. See sphinx.

morning-star (môr'ning-stär'), n. [Cf. AS. morgensteorra (cf. G. morgenstern), < morgen, morn, morning, + steorra, star.] 1. See star.—2. A weapon consisting of a ball of metal, usually set with spikes, either mounted upon a long handle or staff, usually of wood and used with both hands, or slung to the staff by a thong or chain. Also called holy-water sprinkler. Compare war-flail.—Morning-star halberd, a long-handled weapon having the blade of a halberd or partizan, and below it a heavy ball or similar mass of iron set with spikes. Also morning-star partizan. See halberd, partizan.

Morning-star or War-flail, beginning of 15th century.

morning-tide (môr'ning-tīd), n. Morning; figuratively, the early part of any course, especially of life. Compare morrow-tide.

mornspeech†, n. Same as morrow-speech.

It is ordeyned to hauen foure mornspeches in the yere.
English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 45.

morn-tide†, n. Same as morrow-tide.

morn-while†, n. [ME. mornewhile.] The morning time. Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), l. 3224.

moro (mō′rō), n. [Sp. (pájaro) moro, Moorish sparrow.] The vinous grosbeak, stone-bird, or desert-trumpeter, Carpodacus (Bucanetes) githagineus, a small fringilline bird.

Moroccan (mō-rok′an), a. [< Morocco (see morocco) + -an.] Of or pertaining to Morocco, a former sultanate in northwestern Africa, lying west of Algeria, or its inhabitants.

morocco (mō-rok′ō), n. and a. [Short for Morocco leather; cf. equiv. maroquin, < F. maroquin = Sp. marroquí = Pg. marroquim = It. marrocchino, with accom. adj. term., = E. -ine[1]; so called from Morocco or Marocco (ME. Marrok), < Ar. Marrākush, the city which gave its name to the country, and in which the manufacture of morocco leather is still carried on.]

I. n. 1. Leather made from goatskins, tanned with sumac, originally in the Barbary States, but afterward very largely in the Levant, and now produced in Europe from skins imported from Asia and Africa. The peculiar qualities of true morocco are great firmness of texture with flexibility, and a grained surface, of which there are many varieties. This surface is produced by an embossing process called graining. True morocco is of extreme hardness, and makes the most durable bookbindings; it is used for upholstering seats and for similar purposes, and in shoemaking. The name is given to almost any light leather.

2. Leather made in imitation of this, often of sheepskins, and used for the same purposes, but much more largely in shoemaking.—3†. A very strong kind of ale anciently made in Cumberland, said to have a certain amount of beef among its ingredients, the recipe being kept a secret.—French morocco, in bookbinding, an inferior quality of Levant morocco, having usually a smaller and less prominent grain.—Levant morocco. See levant[2].

II. a. Made or consisting of morocco; also, of the common red color of morocco leather.

morocco (mō-rok′ō), v. t. To convert into morocco.

Morocco gum. See gum arabic, under gum[2].

morocco-head (mō-rok′ō-hed), n. The American sheldrake or merganser, Mergus americanus. [New Jersey.]

morocco-jaw (mō-rok′ō-jâ), n. The surf-scoter or surf-duck, Œdemia perspicillata: so called from the color of the beak. G. Trumbull, 1888. [Long Island.]

morology (mō-rol′ō-ji), n. [< Gr. μωρολογία, foolish talking, < μωρολόγος, talking foolishly, < μωρός, foolish, + λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] Foolish speech. Coles, 1717. [Rare.]

moron (mō′ron), n. [< Gr. μωρός, dull, foolish.] An individual with arrested intellectual development, whose mentality corresponds to that of a normal child from eight to twelve years of age.

morone (mō-rōn′), n. [< L. morus, a mulberry-tree: see more[4], Morus.] Same as maroon[1].

Moronobea (mor-ō-nō′bē-ä), n. [NL. (Aublet, 1775), < moronobo, the native name of the tree among the Galibis of Guiana.] A genus of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants of the family Clusiaceæ, type of the tribe Moronobeeæ, distinguished by short sepals, erect twisted petals, and spirally twisted filaments partly monadelphous. Four species are known, natives of Brazil and Guiana. The type-species, M. coccinea, is a tree 20 to 35 feet high, growing in British and French Guiana.

Moronobeeæ (mor-ō-nō-bē′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Engler, 1898), < Moronobea + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the family Clusiaceæ, typified by the genus Moronobea, and characterized by the absence of cotyledons and by an elongated style. It includes 5 genera, of tropical America, Africa, Madagascar, and New Caledonia, all shrubs or trees with gummy juice. Moronobeæ, Endlicher, 1836.

morose[1] (mō-rōs′), a. [= F. morose, < L. morosus, particular, scrupulous, fastidious, self-willed, wayward, capricious, fretful, peevish, < mos (mor-), way, custom, habit, self-will: see moral[1].] 1†. Fastidious; scrupulous.

Speak morose things always, and jocose things at table.
Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), ii. 29.

2. Of a sour temper; severe; sullen and austere.

A morose, ill-conditioned, ill-natured person in all clubs and companies whatsoever. South, Sermons, VI. iii.

Somewhat at that moment pinched him close,
Else he was seldom bitter or morose.
Cowper, Epistle to J. Hill.

=Syn. 2. Gloomy, Sulky, etc. (see sullen), gruff, crabbed, crusty, churlish, surly, ill-humored, ill-natured, cross-grained.

morose[2]† (mō-rōs′), a. [= OF. moros = Sp. It. moroso, lingering, slow, < ML. morosus, lingering, slow, < L. mora, delay: see mora[1]. The form was appar. due in part to morose[1].] Lingering; persistent.

Here are forbidden all wanton words, and all morose delighting in venereous thoughts. Jer. Taylor.

Morose delectation†, in theol., pleasure in the remembrance of past impurities.

morosely (mō-rōs′li), adv. In a morose manner; sourly; with sullen austerity.

moroseness (mō-rōs′nes), n. The state or quality of being morose; sourness of temper; sullenness.

morosity† (mō-ros′i-ti), n. [< F. morosité, < L. morosita(t-)s, peevishness, < morosus, peevish: see morose[1].] 1. Moroseness.

Blot out all peevish dispositions and morosities.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 199.

2†. Morose people.

Feare not what those morosie [read morositie] will murmure whose dead cinders brook no glowing sparkes, nor care not for the opinion of such as hold none but philosophie for a subject. Greene's Vision.

Diogenes was one of the first and foremost of this rusty morositie. Nash, Unfortunate Traveller.

morosoph† (mō′rō-sof), n. [< OF. morosophe, < LGr. μωρόσοφος, foolishly wise, < Gr. μωρός, foolish, + σοφός, wise. Cf. sophomore.] A philosophical or learned fool.

Hereby you may perceive how much I do attribute to the wise foolery of our morosoph, Triboulet.
Rabelais, tr. by Ozell, iii. 46. (Nares.) morosous† (mō-rō′sus), a. [< ML. morosus, lingering: see morose[2].] Same as morose[2].

Daily experience either of often lapses, or morosous desires. Sheldon, Miracles (1616), p. 201.

morowe†, n. A Middle English form of morrow.

morowespeche†, n. Same as morrow-speech.

morowetide†, n. Same as morrow-tide.

moroxite (mō-rok′sīt), n. [< Gr. μόροξος, μόροχθος, a variety of pipe-clay, + -ite[2].] A crystallized form of apatite, occurring in crystals of brownish or greenish-blue color. It is found in Norway.

Morphean (môr′fē-an), a. [< L. Morpheus, q. v., + -an.] Of or belonging to Morpheus, a god of dreams in the later Roman poets.

The Morphean fount
Of that fine element that visions, dreams,
And fitful whims of sleep are made of.
Keats, Endymion, i.

morphetic (môr-fet′ik), a. [Irreg. < Morpheus, q. v., + -etic.] Pertaining to sleep; slumberous. [Rare.]

I am invulnerably asleep at this very moment; in the very centre of the morphetic domains.
Miss Burney, Camilla, ii. 4.

Morpheus (môr′fūs), n. [L. (in Ovid, the first classical writer who mentions Morpheus), < Gr. as if Μορφεύς*, god of dreams, so called from the forms he calls up before the sleeper, < μορφή, form.] In the later Roman poets, a god of dreams, son of Sleep; hence, sleep.

morphew† (môr′fū), n. [Also morfew, morpheaw, morpheu; < F. morphée, morfée = Sp. morfea = Pg. morphea = It. morfea, morfia, < ML. morphea, also morpha, a scurfy eruption, prob. for morphæa* (cf. equiv. morpha), prob. < Gr. μορφή, form, shape.] A scurfy eruption. Dunglison.

A morpheu or staynyng of the skynne.
Elyot, Dictionary, under Alphos, ed. 1559. (Halliwell.)

No man ever saw a gray haire on the head or beard of any Truth, wrinckle, or morphew on its face.
N. Ward, Simple Cobler, p. 23.

morphew† (môr′fū), v. t. [< morphew, n.] To cover with morphew.

Whose bandlesse bonnet vails his o'ergrown chin
And sullen rags bewray his morphew'd skin.
Bp. Hall, Satires, IV. v. 26.

Do you call this painting?
No, no, but you call 't careening of an old Morphewed lady, to make her disembogue again.
Webster, Duchess of Malfi, ii. 1.

morphia (môr′fi-ä), n. [NL., < L. Morpheus, q. v.] Same as morphine.

morphic (môr′fik), a. [< Gr. μορφή, form, + -ic.] In biol., of or pertaining to form; morphological: as, a morphic character.

The majority of specific characters are of divergent origin — are morphic as distinguished from developmental.
E. D. Cope, Origin of the Fittest, p. 111.

Morphic valence, morphological value or equivalency in the scale of evolution of organic forms. Thus, any organism in the gastrula stage of development is a gastrula form, having the morphic valence of a gastrula. Coues.

Morphidæ (môr′fi-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Morpho + -idæ.] The Morphinæ rated as a family.

Morphinæ (môr-fī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Morpho + -inæ.] A subfamily of nymphalid butterflies, typified by the genus Morpho, with large wings, grooved to receive the short abdomen and ocellated on the under side, and filiform antennæ. They are found in tropical America and the East Indian islands, with a few in continental Asia. Ten genera and upward of 100 species compose the subfamily.

morphine (môr′fin), n. [< F. morphine = Pg. morphina = It. morfina, < NL. morphina, morphine, < L. Morpheus, the god of sleep: see Morpheus.] An alkaloid, $C_{17}H_{19}NO_3$, the most important narcotic principle of opium. It crystallizes in brilliant, colorless, odorless, and bitter prisms. It dulls pain, induces sleep, promotes perspiration, checks peristalsis, contracts the pupil, and is extensively used in medicine in the form of its soluble salts. In large doses it causes death with narcotic symptoms.—Morphine or morphia process, in photog., a dry collodion process, now abandoned, in which the preservative agent was a bath of morphine acetate, one grain to the ounce.

morphinism (môr′fin-izm), n. [< morphine + -ism.] A morbid state induced by the use of morphine.

That class of diseases in which morphinism, caffeism, and vanillism are found. The American, XII. 269.

morphinomania (môr″fi-nō-mā′ni-ä), n. [NL.] Same as morphiomania.

morphinomaniac (môr″fi-nō-mā′ni-ak), n. Same as morphiomaniac.

morphiomania (môr″fi-ō-mā′ni-ä), n. [< NL. morphia, q. v., + L. mania, madness: see mania.] A morbid and uncontrollable appetite for morphine or opium; the morphine-habit or opium-habit.

morphiomaniac (môr″fi-ō-mā′ni-ak), n. [< morphiomania + -ac.] One who suffers from morphiomania.

The question arose as to how morphiomaniacs procured the morphine. Lancet, No. 3444, p. 451.

morphiometric (môr″fi-ō-met′rik), a. [< NL. morphia + Gr. μέτρον, measure.] Measuring the amount of morphine: as, morphiometric assays of opium.

Morphnus (môrf′nus), n. [NL., < L. morphnos, a kind of eagle that lives near lakes, < Gr. μόρφνος, dusky, dark: said of an eagle.] A genus of South American diurnal birds of prey founded by Cuvier in 1817; the eagle-hawks. There is but one species, M. guianensis, of large size, 3 feet long, with a crest. Also Morphinus.

Morpho (môr′fō), n. [NL., < Gr. Μορφώ, 'the shapely,' a name of Aphrodite at Sparta, < μορφή, form, shape.] A genus of magnificent nymphalid butterflies, typical of the subfamily Morphinæ. There are upward of 30 species, mostly South American, some expanding over 7 inches, others of celestial blue hues above and ocellated below. M. achilles, M. laertes, M. cypris, M. neoptolemus, and M. polyphemus are examples.

morphœa (môr-fē′ä), n. [NL., for morphæa, < ML. morphea, morphæa*, a scurfy eruption: see morphew.] A disease of the corium presenting multiple roundish patches, at first pinkish and slightly elevated, later pale, smooth, shining, and level or slightly depressed. There is atrophy of the papillary layer of the corium, and cellular infiltration about hair-follicles, sweat-glands, and sebaceous glands and vessels; this infiltration contracts, with subsequent atrophy of glands, follicles, and vessels. The disease is allied to sclerodermia.

morphogenesis (môr-fō-jen′e-sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μορφή, form, + γένεσις, origin: see genesis.] The genesis of form; the production of morphological characters; morphogeny.

morphogenetic (môr″fō-jē-net′ik), a. [< morphogenesis + -ic: see genetic.] Of or pertaining to morphogenesis; morphological, with special reference to ontogeny and phylogeny; embryological in a broad sense; evolutionary or developmental, with reference to biogeny.

morphogenic (môr-fō-jen′ik), a. Same as morphogenetic.

morphogeny (môr-foj′e-ni), n. [< Gr. μορφή, form, + -γένεια, generation: see -geny. Cf. morphogenesis.] 1. In biol., morphogenesis; the genesis of form; the production or evolution of those forms of living matter the study of which is the province of the science of morphology.—2. The history of the evolution of the forms of organisms; morphology, or the science of the forms of living bodies, with special reference to the manner in which, or the means by which, such forms originate or develop; embryology in a broad sense.

Biogeny, or the history of the evolution of organisms, up to the present time has been almost exclusively morphogeny. Haeckel, Evol. of Man (trans.), II. 461.

morphographer (môr-fog'ra-fèr), n. [< morphograph-y + -er[1].] One who investigates morphology or writes on that science.

morphographical (môr-fō-graf'i-kal), a. [< morphograph-y + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to morphography. Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 818.

morphography (môr-fog'ra-fi), n. [< Gr. μορφή, form, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] Descriptive morphology; the systematic investigation, tabulation, and description of the structure of animals, including comparative anatomy, histology, and embryology, and the distribution of animals in time and in space, with special reference to their classification; general or systematic zoölogy.

Morphography.—The work of the collector and systematist: exemplified by Linnæus and his predecessors. Encyc. Brit., XXIV. 803.

morpholecithal (môr-fō-les'i-thal), a. [< morpholecithus + -al.] Germinal or formative, as the vitellus; of or pertaining to the morpholecithus.

morpholecithus (môr-fō-les'i-thus), n. [NL., < Gr. μορφή, form, + λέκιθος, the yolk of an egg.] In embryol., the vitellus formativus, or formative yolk, which undergoes segmentation and germination. It constitutes all the yolk of holoblastic eggs, as those of mammals, but only a part (usually a small part) of the yolk of meroblastic eggs, as of birds, the rest being all food-yolk or tropholecithus.

morphologic (môr-fō-loj'ik), a. [= F. morphologique; as morphology + -ic.] Same as morphological.

morphological (môr-fō-loj'i-kal), a. [< morphologic + -al.] Of or pertaining to morphology; of the character of morphology.

The most characteristic morphological peculiarity of the plant is the investment of each of its component cells by a sac, the walls of which contain cellulose or some closely analogous compound. . . . The most characteristic morphological peculiarity of the animal is the absence of any such cellulose investment. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 46.

Morphological botany. See botany.—Morphological classification, a statement or tabulation or other exhibit of the degrees of structural likeness observed in animal or vegetable organisms. Such classification, based on form without regard to function, and thus appreciating true morphological characters while depreciating mere adaptive modifications, is the main aim of modern taxonomy in zoölogy and botany. The term is also sometimes applied to classifications of languages.—Morphological equivalents. See equivalent.

morphologically (môr-fō-loj'i-kal-i), adv. In a morphological manner; with reference to the facts or principles of morphology; from a morphological point of view.

morphologist (môr-fol'ō-jist), n. [< morphology + -ist.] One who is versed in morphology; a student of morphology.

morphology (môr-fol'ō-ji), n. [= F. morphologie = Sp. morfología = Pg. morphologia, < Gr. μορφή, form, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] 1. The science of form; specif., the science of the outer form and internal structure (without regard to the functions) of animals and plants; that department of science which treats both of the ideal types or plans of structure, and of their actual development or expression in living organisms. It has the same scope and application in organic nature that crystallology has in the inorganic.—2. The science of structure, or of forms, in language. It is that division of the study of language which deals with the origin and function of inflections and derivational forms, or of the more formal as distinguished from the more material part of speech.

Morphology is the science of form (Gr. μορφή), and is here applied to the forms of words as developed by the various kinds of mutation. S. S. Haldeman, Outlines of Etymology, p. 17.

morphometrical (môr-fō-met'ri-kal), a. [< morphometr-y + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to morphometry.

morphometry (môr-fom'et-ri), n. [< Gr. μορφή, form, + -μετρία, < μέτρον, measure.] The art of measuring or ascertaining the external form of objects. Thomas, Med. Dict.

morphon (môr'fon), n. [NL., < Gr. μορφή, form.] A morphological element or factor.

morphonomic (môr-fō-nom'ik), a. [< morphonom-y + -ic.] Of or pertaining to morphonomy; morphologically consequent.

morphonomy (môr-fon'ō-mi), n. [< Gr. μορφή, form, + -νομία, < νέμειν, distribute: see nome[4].] In biol., the laws of morphology; the observed sequence of cause and effect in organic formation; that department of biology which investigates the principles of organic formation or configuration.

morphophyly (môr-fof'i-li), n. [< Gr. μορφή, form, + φυλή, a tribe.] The tribal history of forms; that branch of phylogeny, or tribal history, which treats of form alone, without reference to function, the tribal history of the latter being called physiophyly. Haeckel.

morphosis (môr-fō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. μόρφωσις, a shaping, < μορφοῦν, form, shape, < μορφή, form.] Morphogenesis; the order or mode of formation of any organ or organism.

morpion (môr'pi-on), n. [< F. morpion, a crab-louse, appar. < mordre (< L. mordere), bite, + pion (= It. pedone), < ML. pedio(n-)*, equiv. to pediculus, a louse, < pedis, a louse, < pes (ped-), = E. foot.] The crab-louse, Phthirius pubis. See cut under crab-louse.

Swore you had broke and robbed his house,
And stole his talismanic louse, . . .
His flea, his morpion, and punque.
S. Butler, Hudibras, III. i. 433.

morpunkee (môr-pung'kē), n. [< Hind. morpankhī, a boat with a peacock decoration, a pleasure-boat, < mor, a peacock, + pankhī, a fan, also a bird, dim. of pankhā, a fan, < pankh, a feather, wing, pinion: see punka.] A native pleasure-boat formerly much used for state occasions on the rivers of India. It is very long and narrow, often seating thirty or forty men; it is propelled with paddles, and steered with a large sweep which rises from the stern in the form of a peacock or a dragon.

Morrenian (mo-rē'ni-an), a. [< Morren (see def.) + -ian.] Pertaining to the Belgian naturalist C. F. A. Morren (1807–58): specifically applied in zoölogy to certain glands of worms, as the earthworm, the function of which seems to be to adapt the ingesta for nutrition.

Morrhua (mor'ō-ä), n. [NL., < ML. morua, moruta (F. morue), a cod: said to be ult. < L. merula (?), a fish, the sea-carp.] The principal genus of gadoid fishes, including the common cod: now called Gadus. M. vulgaris is the cod, M. æglefinus the haddock, etc. See cuts under cod[2] and haddock.

morrice, morrice-dance, etc. See morris[1], etc.

morricer (mor'i-sėr), n. [< morrice + -er[1].] A morris-dancer. Scott, L. of the L., v. 22.

morriont, n. See morion[1].

morris[1] (mor'is), n. and a. [Also morrice; < ME. morris, morres, morice, < OF. moreis, moresque, morisque,* F. moresque = It. moresco, < Sp. Morisco, Moorish, < Moro, a Moor: see Moor[4]. Cf. Moresque, Morisco.] I. n. 1. Same as morris-dance.

We are the huisher to a morris,
A kind of masque, whereof good store is In the country hereabout. B. Jonson, The Satyr.

He had that whole bevie at command, whether in morrice or at May pole. Milton, Apology for Smectymnuus.

2. A dance resembling the morris-dance.

We'll have some sport,
Some mad morris or other for our money, tutor.
Fletcher, Wildgoose Chase, iii. 1.

Nine men's morris, a game in which a figure of squares one within another was made on a table or on the ground, and eighteen pieces or stones, nine for each side, which were placed by turns in the angles, were moved alternately, as at draughts. He who was enabled to place three in a straight line took off one of his adversary's at any point he pleased, and the game ended by the loss of all the men of one of the players. It was also a table-game played with counters. Also called nine men's merels. Strutt.

The nine-men's morris is fill'd up with mud,
And the quaint mazes in the wanton green
For lack of tread are undistinguishable.
Shak., M. N. D., ii. 1. 98.

II. a. Belonging to or taking part in a morris-dance.

morris[1] (mor'is), v. [< morris[1], n.] I. trans. To dance or perform by dancing. See morris-dance.

Since the Demon-dance was morriced, Hood, The Forge.

II. intrans. To "dance" or "waltz" off; decamp; be off; begone. [Slang.]

Zounds! here they are. Morrice! Prance!
Goldsmith, She Stoops to Conquer, iii.

morris[2] (mor'is), n. [NL., so called after William Morris, who first found it, on the coast of Wales.] A curious fish, the larva of the conger-eel. Its body is transparent and so compressed as to resemble tape.

morris-bells†, n. pl. Bells for a morris-dance.

morris-dance (mor'is-dans), n. [Also morrice-dance; < ME. morrys-daunce; < morris[1] + dance.] 1. A dance of persons in costume, especially of persons wearing hoods and dresses tagged with bells; also, any mumming performance in which dancing played a conspicuous part. Thus, the morris-dancers of May-day commonly represented the personages of the Robin Hood legend; the hobby-horse was a prominent character in morris-dancing of every description.

Unless we should come in like a morrice-dance, and whistle our ballad ourselves, I know not what we should do. B. Jonson, Love Restored.

I judged a man of sense could scarce do worse Than caper in the morris-dance of verse.
Cowper, Table-Talk, l. 519.

2. A kind of country-dance still popular in the north of England. The music for all these dances was, so far as is known, in duple time.

Also called Morisco, Moor-dance, and formerly Moresque dance.

morris-dancer (mor'is-dan″sėr), n. [< ME. morresdauncer; < morris[1] + dancer.] One who takes part in a morris-dance.

Item, paide in charges by the appointment of the parisshioners, for the settinge forth of a gyaunt morres daunsers with vj. calyvers, and iij. boies on horsback, to go in the watche befoore the Lord Maiore uppon Midsomer even, . . . vj. li. ix. s. ix. d.
Accounts of St. Giles', Cripplegate, 1571. (Halliwell.)

And, like a morris-dancer dress'd with bells,
Only to serve for noise, and nothing else.
S. Butler, Human Learning, ii.

morris-dancing (mor'is-dan″sing), n. The morris or morris-dance; the act of dancing the morris.

May-games, morris-dancings, pageants, and processions . . . were commonly exhibited throughout the kingdom. Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 20.

morris-pike† (mor'is-pīk), n. [Also morrice-pike, morice-pike, morys pike, etc.; < morris[1], in orig. adj. sense 'Moorish' (?), + pike[1].] A pike supposed to be of Moorish origin.

4. Specifically, the number of deaths in proportion to population: usually stated as the number of deaths per thousand of population. —5. The duration of human life. [Rare.]

This Age of ours
Should not be numbered by years, dayes, and howrs,
But by our brave Exployts; and this Mortality
Is not a moment to that Immortality.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Magnificence.

6. Humanity; human nature; the human race.

Like angels' visits, short and bright,
Mortality's too weak to bear them long.
Norris, The Parting.

Bills of mortality, abstracts from public registers showing the numbers that have died in any parish or place during certain periods of time.

He proceeded to acquaint her who of quality was well or sick within the bills of mortality. Steele, Tatler, No. 207.

Law of mortality, the principle, deduced from a study and analysis of the bills of mortality and the experiences of insurance companies during a long number of years, which determines what average proportion of the persons who enter upon a particular period of life will die during that period, and consequently the proportion of those who will survive. Tables showing the estimated number of persons of a given age that will die in each succeeding year are called tables of mortality. Thus, of 100,000 persons of the age of 10, 490 will not reach the age of 11; of 99,510 persons remaining alive, 397 will die before reaching the age of 12, and so on. On these tables are largely founded the calculations of insurance actuaries in regard to rates of premium, present value of policies, etc.

mortalize (môr'tal-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. mortalized, ppr. mortalizing. [< mortal + -ize.] To make mortal. Also spelled mortalise.

morter, MHG. mortere, morter, mortel, G. mörtel, < L. mortarium, mortar, a mixture of lime and sand, so called from the vessel in which it was made, a mortar: see mortar[1].] A material used (in building) for binding together stones or bricks so that the mass may form one compact whole. The use of mortar dates back to the earliest recorded history, but various materials were employed for that purpose. "Bitumen" (asphaltum and maltha), or bituminous mixtures, are known to have been used in Babylon and Nineveh. Plaster (calcined sulphate of lime) was the cement employed on the Great Pyramid, and apparently by the Egyptians generally, but not to the entire exclusion of what is now ordinarily called mortar. The substances mentioned are frequently designated as mortar in non-technical works. What is now generally understood by this term among builders and architects is a mixture of lime with water and sand, in various proportions, according to the "fatness" of the lime and the desire to economize the more costly material. This kind of mortar was well known to both Greeks and Romans. Mortar made of ordinary lime "sets" (hardens) in the air (not under water) and slowly, since the absorption of carbonic acid and the consequent conversion of the hydrate of lime into the carbonate is by no means a rapid process. The hardening of the mortar depends in large part on the crystallization of the carbonate of lime around the grains of sand, by which these are made to cohere firmly; hence, a clean sand of which the grains are angular is of importance in forming a durable mortar. The kind of mortar which sets under water is sometimes called hydraulic mortar, but is more generally known as hydraulic cement, or simply cement. See cement and cement-stone.

A morter fast is made aboute the tree.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 108.

So brycke was their stone and slyme was theyr morter.

mortgage (môr'gāj), n. [Formerly also morgage; < ME. mortgage, morgage, < OF. morgage, mortgaige, morgage, morouage, prop. separate, mort gage, mortgage, F. mortgage, lit. a dead pledge, < mort, dead, + gage, a pledge: see mort[1] and gage[1].] 1. (a) At common law (and according to the present rule in some of the United States, and in form in nearly all, if not all, the States), a conveyance of real estate or some interest therein, defeasible upon the payment of money or the performance of some other condition. (b) By the law of most of the United States, a lien or charge upon specific property, real or personal, created by what purports to be an express transfer of title, with or without possession, but accompanied by a condition that the transfer shall be void if in due time the money be paid or the thing done to secure which the transfer is given. It differs from a pledge in that it is not confined to personal property, and in that it is in form a transfer of title, while a pledge is of chattels and is usually a transfer of possession without the title, but with authority to sell and transfer both title and possession in case of default. (See pledge.) At common law a mortgage was regarded (as in form it is still almost universally expressed) as actually transferring the title. (See (a), above.) Courts of equity established the rule that a mortgager of real property could, by payment or performance, redeem it even after default, at any time before the court had adjudged his right foreclosed or the mortgagee had caused a sale of the property to pay the debt (see equity of redemption, under equity); consequently mortgages ceased to be regarded in most jurisdictions as a transfer of the title, and are now generally held to create a mere lien, although the form of the instrument is unchanged. The term mortgage is applied indifferently (a) to the transaction, (b) to the deed by which it is effected, and (c) to the rights conferred thereby on the mortgagee.

2. A state or condition resembling that of mortgaged property.

His trouth plite lieth in morgage,
Whiche if he breke, it is falschode.
Gower, Conf. Amant., vii.

Though God permitted the Jews, in punishment of their rebellions, to be captivated by the devil in idolatries, yet the Jews were but as in a mortgage, for they had been God's peculiar people before. Donne, Sermons, iii.

Chattel mortgage. See chattel.—Equitable mortgage, a transaction which has the intent but not the form of a mortgage, and which a court of equity will enforce to the same extent as a mortgage, as, for instance, a loan on the faith of a deposit of title-deeds.—General mortgage-bond. See bond[1].—Mortgage debentures. See debenture, 1.—Welsh mortgage, a kind of mortgage formerly used in Wales and Ireland, by which the mortgager, without engaging personally for the payment of the debt, transferred the title and possession of the property to the mortgagee, who was to take the rents and profits and apply them on the interest; and there might be a stipulation that any surplus should be applied on the principal. Under this form of mortgage the mortgagee could not compel the mortgager to redeem or be foreclosed of his right to redeem, for no time was fixed for payment, and the mortgager was never in default; but the mortgagee had the right at any time to redeem (and, though there were no personal debt, an account might be taken as if there were, in order to ascertain what he must pay to redeem); and the statute of limitations did not begin to run against his claim until after full payment of the principal.

mortgage (môr'gāj), v. t.; pret. and pp. mortgaged, ppr. mortgaging. [< mortgage, n.] 1. To grant (land, houses, or other immovable property) as security for money lent or contracted to be paid, or other obligation, on condition that if the obligation shall be discharged according to the contract the grant shall be void, otherwise it shall remain in full force. See mortgage, n., 1. Hence—2. To pledge; make liable; put to pledge; make liable for the payment of any debt or expenditure; put in a position similar to that of being pledged.

Mortgaging their lives to Covetise,
Through wastfull Pride and wanton Riotise,
They were by law of that proud Tyrannesse.
Spenser, F. Q., I. v. 46.

Mortise-wheel.

mortising-machine (môr′tis-ing-ma-shēn″), n. A machine for cutting or boring mortises in wood. Such machines range from a pivoted lever, worked by the hand or foot and operating a chisel moving in upright guides, to power gang-boring machines for making a number of mortises at once in heavy timber. These larger machines employ either chisels, that cut out the mortises by repeated thrusts, or routers and boring-tools.

mortling†, n. See morling.

mortmain (môrt′mān), n. [< OF. mortemain, also main morte, F. mainmorte = Sp. manos muertas, pl., = Pg. mão morta = It. mano morta, < ML. mortua manus, manus mortua, mortmain, lit. 'dead hand': L. mortua, fem. of mortuus, pp. of mori, dead; manus, hand: see mort[2] and main[3]. Cf. mortgage.] In law, possession of lands or tenements in dead hands, or hands that cannot alienate, as those of ecclesiastical corporations; unalienable possession. Conveyances and devises to corporations, civil or ecclesiastical, were forbidden by Magna Charta, and have been restrained and interdicted by subsequent statutes. Also called dead-hand.

All purchases made by corporate bodies being said to be purchases in mortmain, in mortua manu; for the reason of which appellation Sir Edward Coke offers many conjectures; but there is one which seems more probable than any that he has given us: viz., that these purchases being usually made by ecclesiastical bodies, the members of which (being professed) were reckoned dead persons in law, land therefore holden by them might with great propriety be said to be held in mortua manu. Blackstone, Com., I. xviii.

Though the statutes of mortmain had put some obstacles to its increase, yet . . . a larger proportion of landed wealth was constantly accumulating in hands which lost nothing that they had grasped. Hallam, Const. Hist., ii.

Mortise and Tenon.
M, mortise; T, tenon.

Here [Sicily], in the end, Rome laid her mortmain upon Greek, Phœnician, and Sikeliot alike, turning the island into a granary and reducing its inhabitants to serfdom.
J. A. Symonds, Italy and Greece, p. 143.

Alienation in mortmain, an alienation of lands or tenements to any corporation, sole or aggregate, ecclesiastical or temporal, particularly to religious houses, by which the estate becomes perpetually inherent in the corporation and unalienable.—Mortmain Act, an English statute of 1736 (9 Geo. II., c. 36), based on the impolicy of allowing gifts, under the name of charity, to be made by persons in view of approaching death, to the disinheritance of their lawful heirs. It prohibits, except in the instance of some universities and colleges, all alienation of land for charitable purposes (unless on full and valuable consideration) otherwise than by deed indented and executed in the presence of two or more witnesses, twelve months before the death of the donor, and enrolled in chancery within six months after its date, and taking effect in possession immediately after the making thereof, and without power of revocation or any reservation for the benefit of the grantor or persons claiming under him.—Statutes of mortmain, the name under which are known a number of English statutes, beginning in 1225 (9 Hen. III., c. 36; 7 Edw. I., st. 2; 13 Edw. I., c. 32; 15 Rich. II., c. 5; 23 Hen. VIII., c. 10), restricting or forbidding the giving of land to religious houses. The Mortmain Act (which see, above) is sometimes incorrectly called a statute of mortmain.

Chaucer, Gen. Prol. to C. T., l. 384.

A mortress made with the brawn of capons, stamped, strained, and mingled with like quantity of almond butter, is excellent to nourish the weak. Bacon, Nat. Hist.

mortreux, mortrewes, n. See mortress.

mort-safe (môrt′sāf), n. [< mort[2] + safe.] An iron coffin.

Iron coffins, called mort safes, were used in Scotland as a precaution against resurrectionists. After time had been allowed for the wooden coffin to decay, the grave was reopened, and the mort safe taken out for further use.
N. and Q., 7th ser., VI. 516.

mortstone (môrt′stōn), n. [< mort[2] + stone.] A large stone by the wayside between a village and the parish church, on which in former times the bearers of a dead body rested the coffin.

'Tis here,
Six furlongs from the chapel. What is this?
Oh me! the mortstone.
Sir H. Taylor, Edwin the Fair, v. 7.

mortuary (môr′tū-ā-ri), a. and n. [= F. mortuaire = Sp. mortuorio = Pg. mortuario = It. mortorio, mortoro, < L. mortuarius, belonging to the dead, ML. neut. mortuarium, also mortuorium, a mortuary, < L. mortuus, dead: see mort[2].] I. a. Of or pertaining to the burial of the dead.—Mortuary chaplet, a wreath or crown put upon the head of a corpse at the funeral ceremony and often left with it in the tomb. Such a garland was known by the Romans as corollarium. In mediæval Europe these wreaths were common, especially in the case of women who died unmarried. They were sometimes made of filigree-work with gold and silver wire.—Mortuary chest, a coffer of wood or other material intended to receive the remains of bodies once buried elsewhere, when the graves have been disturbed.

II. n.; pl. mortuaries (-riz). 1. In law, a sort of ecclesiastical heriot, a customary gift claimed by and due to the minister of a parish on the death of a parishioner. It seems to have been originally a voluntary bequest or donation, intended to make amends for any failure in the payment of tithes of which the deceased had been guilty. Mortuaries, where due by custom, were recoverable in the ecclesiastical courts.

The curate clamed ye beryng shete for a mortuary.
Hall, Hen. VIII., an. 6.

The Payment of Mortuaries is of great Antiquity. It was antiently done by leading or driving a Horse or Cow, &c., before the Corps of the Deceased at his Funeral. It was considered as a Gift left by a Man at his Death, by Way of Recompence for all Failures in the Payment of Tithes and Oblations, and called a Corse-present.
Bourne's Pop. Antiq. (1777), p. 25.

2. A burial-place. Whitlock.—3. A place for the temporary reception of the dead; a dead-house.—4. A memorial of the death of some beloved or revered person; especially, in the seventeenth century, a sword bearing some emblem of the wearer's devotion to the memory of Charles I. and the cause of royalty.

Swords of this type [cavalry sword, time of the Commonwealth] are often called mortuary, as a number of them were made in memory of Charles I., and bear his likeness upon the hilt.
Edgerton-Castle, Schools and Masters of Fence, p. 240.

★morula (mor′ō-lä), n.; pl. morulæ (-lē). [NL., dim. of L. morum, a mulberry: see more[4].] In embryol., the condition (resembling a mulberry) of an ovum after complete segmentation of the vitellus or yolk and before the formation of a blastula, when the contents are a mass of cells derived by cleavage of the original and successively formed nuclei; a mulberry-mass of blastomeres or cleavage-cells. See monerula, blastula, gastrula, and cut under gastrulation.

The number of blastomeres thus increases in geometrical progression until the entire yelk is converted into a mulberry-like body, termed a morula, made up of a great number of small blastomeres or nucleated cells.
Huxley, Crayfish, p. 206.

morulation (mor-ō-lā′shọn), n. [< morula + -ation.] In embryol., the conversion of the vitellus or yolk of an ovum into a mulberry-mass (morula) of cleavage-cells.

★moruloid (mor′ō-loid), a. [< morula + -oid.] Having the character of a morula; resembling a morula.

Morus (mō′rus), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), < L. morus, a mulberry-tree: see more[4].] A genus of dicotyledonous trees, type of the apetalous family Moraceæ, of the tribe Moreæ; the mulberries. It is characterized by spicate flowers, the fertile with a 4-parted perianth, and by leaves 3-nerved from the base. The mulberry-fruit is a multiple fleshy fruit formed by the coalescence of many ovaries and investing perianths. About 10 species are known, natives of the northern hemisphere and of mountains in the tropics; some are valued for their edible fruit, and some for their leaves, which are used as silkworm-food. See mulberry.

Morvan's disease. A disease described by Morvan in 1883, characterized by a progressive anæsthesia and akinesia, especially of the extremities, accompanied by trophic disturbances, including ulceration and necrosis. The nerves have been found to exhibit an intense inflammation, so that it has been regarded as a multiple neuritis. Also called analgesia panaris and pareso-analgesia.

morwe, n. A Middle English form of morrow.

morwen, n. A Middle English form of morn, morrow.

The threads are held firmly in a frame, so as to form a dense mass, with the upper ends of the threads presenting a close surface; this surface is smeared with a cement, and has a backing of canvas attached, after which a transverse section is cut the desired thickness of the pile, and so on with a number of similar sections.

II. n. 1. Mosaic work; inlaid work, especially in hard materials, as distinguished from inlays of wood, ivory, or the like. The most common materials for mosaic are colored stones and glass, pavements and floors being more commonly made of the former. Glass mosaic is composed either of pieces cut from small colored rods which are prepared in a suitable variety of colors and shades, and by means of which pictorial effects can readily be obtained, as in Roman mosaic, or of tesseræ made each by itself, the colors used in this method being fewer and the pieces usually about a quarter of an inch square. The latter variety may be distinguished as Byzantine or Venetian mosaic. Mosaic was a usual decoration among the later Greeks and the Romans, and among the Byzantines and their immediate artistic followers, as at Ravenna and Venice, and in the splendid Norman-Saracenic churches of Sicily, displayed a preëminent excellence of design and magnificence of color. The art has recently been revived, with especial success in Italy and France.

The architectural character of mosques varies greatly, according as they occupy free or cramped sites, and as in construction they are original foundations or adaptations of existing buildings. The normal plan of the mosque is rectangular, and includes, besides the covered place of worship proper, an open cloistered court with a fountain for ablutions, and one or more minarets from which the faithful are summoned to prayer at stated hours. The dome, supported on pendentives, and the arch, usually pointed, of the horse-shoe (Saracenic) form, and springing from slender columns, together with elaborate and often splendidly colored surface-ornament, mainly geometrical, are features of very frequent occurrence. In the interior the chief decoration is found in numerous hanging lamps. The direction of Mecca is indicated by a niche or recess, sometimes a mere tablet inscribed with verses from the Koran, called family Culicidæ or gnats, though some members of related families, as Simuliidæ, are called mosquitos, the term being applied in most parts of the world to gnats which have a piercing and sucking proboscis and annoy man. The name is said to have arisen in the West Indies, where it specifically designates Stegomyia mosquito, a variety of the species which is the conveyer of yellow fever. Mosquitos are commonly supposed to be especially tropical insects; but they swarm in summer in almost inconceivable numbers in arctic and cold temperate latitudes, as in Labrador, or in the region of the Red River of the North, and throughout the moist wooded or marshy regions of British America. They breed in water, and hence are most numerous in marshy and swampy places. The life of the adult insect may extend over several weeks, and many live through the winter, hibernating in dark corners of out-buildings, in cellars, and in the holds of ships. Mosquitos are the essential agents in the spread of many of the diseases of man, among them malaria, yellow fever, filariasis, and possibly dengue. Several species of the genus Anopheles have been shown to be conveyers of the causative organism of malaria, and certain species of other genera of the subfamily Anophelinæ may be the secondary hosts of this parasitic organism. The yellow fever mosquito is Stegomyia fasciata (calopus). No other mosquitos of this genus have been shown to convey the disease. The filaria carrier is a culex, and a species of the genus Culex is said to carry dengue.

moss-box (môs′boks), n. A kind of huge stuffing-box used in a method of sinking shafts invented by M. J. Chaudron, a Belgian engineer, for preventing water from entering at the bottom of the tubing. It consists of flanged rings arranged to form an annular box, in which moss is placed to form a packing and compressed by the weight of the superincumbent tubing, thus permanently stopping the inflow of water from upper strata which would otherwise descend outside the tubing and enter the pit at the bottom.

mossbunker (môs′bung-kėr), n. [Also mossbonker, mossbanker, massbanker, marshbunker, marshbanker, morsebonker, morsbunker, mousebunker, etc., and abbr. bunker, in earlier form marsbancker (1679), < D. marsbanker, the scad or horse-mackerel, Caranx trachurus, which annually visits the shores of northern Europe in immense schools, and swims at the surface in much the same manner as the mossbunker—this name being transferred by the Dutch of New York to the fish now so called (it occurs so applied, in the form masbank, in a Dutch poem by Jacob Steedman in 1661). The D. marsbanker (Gronovius, 1754) is not in the dictionaries. Its formation is not clear; appar. < mars, a peddler's pack (or mas, a mass, crowd), + bank, bank, + -er (= E. -er[1]); prob. in allusion to its appearance in schools.] The menhaden, Brevoortia tyrannus. See cut under Brevoortia.

This bay [New York] swarms with fish, both large and small, whales, tunnies, . . . and a sort of herring called the marsbanckers.
Dankers and Sluyter, Voyage to New York, 1679 (tr. in 1867 [for Coll. Long Island Hist. Soc., I. 100).

He saw the duyvel, in the shape of a huge moss-bunker, seize the sturdy Anthony by the leg, and drag him beneath the waves. Irving, Knickerbocker (ed. Grolier), II. 223.
